In this ill-smelling body, which is a conglomerate of bone, skin, muscle, marrow, flesh, semen, blood, mucus, tears, rheum, feces, urine, wind, bile, and phlegm, what is the good of enjoyment of desires? . . . In this body, which is afflicted with desire, anger, covetousness, delusion, fear, despondency, envy, separation from the desirable, union with the undesirable, hunger, thirst, senility, disease, sorrow, and the like, what is the good of the enjoyment of desires? . . . we see that this whole world is decaying . . . In this sort of cycle of existence, what is the good of the enjoyment of desires, when after a man has fed on them there is seen repeatedly his return here to earth? . . . in this cycle of existence I am a frog in a waterless well.

A Theravada text¹¹ says:

What then is the Holy Truth of Ill? Birth is ill, decay is ill, sickness is ill, death is ill. To be disjoined from what one likes means suffering. Not to get what one wants also that means suffering. In short, all grasping at any of the five Skandas [the elements of personality] involves suffering.

Being a frog in countless waterless wells, or suffering in endless cosmic variety, in these views, only prolongs a problem to which religion should provide a solution. An everlasting series of reincarnations would be the analogue to hell. Life is viewed as inherently unsatisfactory or unsatisfying – one scholar uses “unsatisfactoriness” rather than “suffering” in dealing with the sort of Buddhist text just quoted. Hinduism, Jainism, and Theravada Buddhism, then, each offers an escape from the Wheel of reincarnations.

The point of the story of the traveller in the forest now becomes clear. Most people are like the traveller. We focus our attention on “the things of this world” as the traveller focuses simply on the sweet taste of the honey. But the honey gives no solution to his deep, real problem. So most of us pay no attention to our deep religious problem. “The things of this world” provide no solution to that problem, whether we live grandly or barely survive. This is the point of the story. On that point, at least, religious traditions typically agree.

Advaita Vedanta

Advaita Vedanta is one of three main schools of Vedantic Hinduism; the other two are monotheistic. Popular Advaita Vedanta tends to polytheistic or monotheistic practices. Nonetheless, Advaita Vedanta takes monotheism to belong to the realm of appearance rather than to the realm of reality. There are two major ways of trying to explain what this distinction amounts to. One way treats the appearance/reality distinction epistemologically or relative to human knowledge, and speaks of levels of truth. Another way treats the appearance versus reality distinction metaphysically or in terms of what exists independent of human thought, and speaks of levels of being. The levels of being view goes something like this.

Suppose that something A depends for its existence on B, and B does not depend for its existence on anything else. Then one might (somewhat misleadingly) say that B has more reality than A, although strictly what is true is that B’s existence is more secure than A’s. Suppose, further, that B has more power, and knowledge, and goodness than A, or is more complex than A, or the like – suppose that B’s properties are in some way more glorious than A’s. Then one might say that B is “more real” than A in the sense of being more valuable than A, more worth imitating than A, or the like. It seems less open to misunderstanding to say all of this in terms of the greater existential security and the higher value that attaches to B, but insofar as what was intended was consistent, these sorts of things seem to be what philosophers who have talked about “degrees of existence” have had in mind. But this – the levels of being line – cannot be the way to understand Shankara. For if appearance depends on Reality, then appearance and Reality are such that appearance bears a genuine and non-illusory or non-apparent relationship to Reality; both appearance and Reality exist, and the former depends on the latter. On Shankara's view, Reality can bear no such relationship to anything. Further, the properties of Reality can be more glorious than appearance's properties only if Reality has more glorious properties than those of appearance, and so on this view Reality has properties. But according to Shankara, Reality is nirguna or qualityless. So the levels of being line will not do as an exposition of Advaita Vedanta.

There remains the levels of truth line. Some elementary points regarding this are: (1) strictly, truth has no degrees; as a property of propositions, which seems what is here relevant, it is either present or not; (2) no doubt "more true" can be given some use, and if one is very careful no doubt this will cause no confusion; then we need to ask exactly what this sense is: compare "more perfect;" (3) if two propositions are contradictory then one must be true and the other false.

Now on a levels of truth view, the truth about Reality is one level of truth and the truth about appearance is another level of truth. Reality is qualityless Brahman. Thus when Brahman is described as being, consciousness, and bliss – sat, cit, ananda – this (if Brahman is really qualityless) is but to deny that Brahman has the properties of being non-existent, unconscious, and miserable. The truth about Reality, on Shankara's view, is that Brahman exists, and for any property, Brahman lacks it. This is a bit sparse, but it is the truth at the level of reality. The other level concerns appearance. There is something funny about the phrase "the truth about appearance" when used in this context. The reason for this is simple: strictly speaking, appearance does not exist. That is the truth about it. Perhaps, then, appearance is simply the way Reality looks to the unenlightened. But the unenlightened are part of appearance. Thus they do not exist, and so cannot be appeared to. The levels of truth view is that Reality appears to be one way and is another; there are perceptual experiences but they are all unreliable or misleading and there are perceivers but they are misled. But then these misleading experiences and misled perceivers must be real. But strictly they do not exist; they are not merely less glorious than the Real, but altogether non-existent. It is thus not easy to see how the lower level of truth is to be conceived. On it, appearance is as hard to make out as Reality.

Having spent some time in indicating some of the complexity involved in interpreting Advaita Vedanta, and given some indication of the sort of features that lead to objections by such non-Advaitic figures as Ramanuja and Madhva, let me turn to offering a brief and fairly straightforward description of this tradition. There is an ultimate and independent reality that is apersonal. To say that God is infinite is not, as in monotheistic contexts, to say that God is omnipotent, omniscient, and morally perfect. Rather, it is to say that everything is divine. For monotheism, “infinite” is an adjective, and to speak of “the Infinite” is to raise the question “The Infinite what?” For Advaita Vedanta, “the Infinite” is a noun referring to Brahman. Persons seem to be enduring mental substances, and the objects of sensory perception seem to be enduring physical substances. This indeed is how they are to be viewed unless we turn to the level of Reality. Then the truth is that each Atman or enduring self is identical to Brahman; “Thou art that.” The basic religious problem is ignorance – taking appearance to be Reality. Escape from this ignorance requires that one attain moksha, an esoteric experience in which it is alleged that no subject/ conscious/object or subject/object distinction can be made. Personal identity obviously is not retained in one’s solving one’s religious problem; indeed, strictly, personal identity is viewed as always illusory and you cannot retain what you never had. Achieving moksha is due to one’s efforts; salvation is essentially a do-it-yourself project for Advaita Vedanta, as it is for Jainism and Theravada Buddhism.¹² An Advaita Vedanta text tells us that “the man who has once comprehended Brahman to be the [real] self does not belong to this transmigratory world . . . There prevails the false notion that the Lord [i.e. Brahman] and the transmigrating soul are different.”¹³ The description of Advaita Vedanta offered here is, in effect, an explanation of what this passage means according to an Advaitic interpretation.

Jainism

Jainism is a particularly interesting religion in that it holds to the immortality of the soul without being monotheistic. It holds that the self or person or jiva is an enduring mental substance that is inherently immortal. Human persons appear to be enduring mental substances because they are enduring mental substances, just as physical objects appear to be enduring physical substances because they are. A Jaina text says straightforwardly that “modifications cannot exist without an abiding or eternal something – a permanent substance.”¹⁴ But persons seem to have limitations that they do not have, and by attaining an esoteric state of enlightenment – kevala – one can see that these limitations are illusory. Thus in the *Jaina Sutras*¹⁵ one reads that when the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had become enlightened, he was omniscient and comprehending all objects; he knew and saw all conditions of the world, of gods, men, and demons: whence they come, whither they go, whether they are born as men or animals . . . or become gods or hell-beings . . . the ideas, the thoughts of their minds, the food, doings, desires, the open and secret deeds of all living beings in the whole world; he the Arhat, for whom there is no secret, knew and saw all conditions of all living beings in the world, what they thought, spoke, or did at any moment.

Occasionally it is claimed that one who reaches kevala even learns that he or she is omnipotent; at any rate, one learns that one is omniscient and dependent for one's existence on nothing external to oneself. The same Sutras say of the soul that "since it possesses no corporeal form, it is eternal."¹⁶ This is not a variety of monotheism; there is no reference to God or (as in monotheistic Hinduism) to Brahman with qualities. Nor does it posit an identity between the soul and qualityless Brahman. Another Jaina text says that

Liberation is the freedom from all karmic matter, owing to the non-existence of the cause of bondage and to the shedding of the karmas. After the soul is released, there remain perfect right-belief, perfect right-knowledge, and the state of having accomplished all.¹⁷

Thus personal identity is retained in enlightenment; a mental substance that once existed under severe epistemic and other constraints is freed from those constraints.

Buddhism

Theravada Buddhism

A Buddhist text says that

Nagasena [or any other personal proper name] is but a way of counting, term, appellation, convenient designation, mere name for the hair of my head, hair of my body . . . brain of the head, form, sensation, perception, the predispositions and consciousness. But in the absolute sense there is no ego.¹⁸

An individual person is a set of elements, each momentary and transitory, and everything else is made up of momentary, transitive states as well. There is no atman or jiva or enduring self – no enduring mental substance – nor is there an unchanging ultimate Brahman. Thus one reads that Misery only doth exist, none miserable. No doer is there; naught save the deed is found. Nirvana is, but not the man who seeks this. That path exists, but not the man who seeks this. That path exists, but not the traveller on it.¹⁹

We are told that as the word "chariot" is but a name for pole, axle, wheels, chariot-body, and banner staff . . . [the proper name] "Nagasena" is but a . . . mere name for the hair of my head, brain of the head, form, sensation, perception, the predispositions, and consciousness. But in the absolute sense there is no ego to be found.²⁰

In a this-life experience that prefigures final nirvana the enlightened one learns this truth concerning impermanence. Final nirvana is the cessation of even this transitory self with consequent release from all desire. Nirvana alone is changeless.

Comparison

It may aid comprehension if we compare and contrast our Indian traditions. For Advaita Vedanta, there is a distinction between the apparent self and the real; one cannot escape transmigration without knowing the nature of this distinction – namely, that the real self is identical with qualityless Brahman. For Jainism, there is a distinction between the way the self appears regarding knowledge and dependence and the way the self is regarding knowledge and dependence; we are omniscient and independent, and one cannot escape transmigration without knowing this. For Theravada, we tend to believe that there is an enduring ego or self, and there is none; one cannot escape transmigration without knowing this. In each case, the religious problem we all face is said to be ignorance of our own nature. Each religious tradition has its own account of the truth about what our nature is. Correspondingly, each has its own cure, namely the recognition of and appropriate reaction to the truth about ourselves.

The criteria applied

According to Christianity, our sickness is that we have sinned against God and the cure is that God provide forgiveness and restoration. According to Advaita Vedanta, the sickness is our ignorance of our being identical with Brahman and the cure is gaining this knowledge. According to Jainism, the sickness is that we think we are ignorant and dependent and the cure is learning that we are omniscient and existentially independent. According to Theravada Buddhism, our sickness is that we take ourselves to be enduring substances and the cure is learning that we are only transitory states. While brief, lacking subtlety and detail, these remarks are also accurate.

We can summarize the diagnoses and cures as follows:

- Christianity: sinners, divine forgiveness and restoration;
- Advaita Vedanta: ignorance of Brahman, knowledge of Brahman;
- Jainism: assumed ignorance and dependence, knowledge of independence and omniscience;
- Theravada Buddhism: assumed status as enduring substances, knowledge of transitory states.

Earlier, three criteria were offered of what it might mean to speak about different sorts of religions. The first of these was:

Criterion 1: Religion A is of a different sort from Religion B if one can have the problem that A diagnoses without having the problem that B diagnoses, one can have the problem that B diagnoses without having the problem that A diagnoses, the cure that A proffers would not cure the disease that B diagnoses, and the cure that B proffers would not cure the disease that A diagnoses.

Assuming that it is logically possible that any one of these diagnoses be correct, and logically possible that any one of these cures works regarding its target disease, it is obviously possible to have any of the alleged diseases – sin, ignorance of Brahman, assumed dependence and ignorance, assumed enduring substance and actual transitory states – without having any of the others. Further, no one cure would work for any of the sicknesses save the one with which it is correlated by the religious tradition that suggests it. So, by Criterion 1, we have four distinct sorts of religions.

The second criterion was:

Criterion 2: Religion A is of a different sort from Religion B if what must exist if A's diagnosis and cure is correct can exist without what must exist if B's diagnosis and cure are correct, and conversely.

What must exist if the diagnoses and cures are correct can be represented as follows:

- Christianity: God, persons created by God;
- Advaita Vedanta: only qualityless Brahman;
- Jainism: independently existing persons;
- Theravada Buddhism:²¹ only transitory states.

Assuming that each account of what there must be if the diagnoses and cures are correct is possibly true, it is obvious that each could exist without the others existing.

The third criterion was:

Criterion 3: Religion A is of a different sort from Religion B if what must exist if A's diagnosis and cure are correct cannot co-exist with what must exist if B's diagnosis and cure are correct, and conversely.

Plainly, in the context of its overall religious tradition, each account of what there is has this feature: if it is true, the others are not.²²

Given the discussion just concluded, it is clear that Christianity, Advaita Vedanta, Theravada Buddhism, and Jainism are, given any of these criteria, different sorts of religions. One may like, dislike, or be indifferent to this fact; but it is a fact. These are neither all the religions nor all the sorts of religion that there are. But we have made progress in laying out data relevant to philosophical reflections about religion.

Questions for reflection

- 1 What are the core doctrines of monotheistic religions? What philosophical issues do they raise?
- 2 What are the core doctrines of Christian monotheism? Do these doctrines raise any philosophical issues not also raised by monotheism alone?
- 3 What are the core doctrines of Theravada Buddhism? What philosophical issues do they raise?
- 4 What are the core doctrines of Jainism? What philosophical issues do they raise?
- 5 What are the core doctrines of Advaita Vedanta? What philosophical issues do they raise?

6 Are the criteria offered for religions being of different sorts philosophically neutral and accurately applied?

Annotated reading

Christian, William (1972) Opposition of Religious Doctrines, New York: Herder and Herder. An account of how we can discover and may understand doctrinal differences between religions.

Larsen, Gerald James and Deutsch, Elliot (eds) (1988) Interpreting across Boundaries, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. Investigates some of the challenges and rewards of considering religion in a cross-cultural context.

Schmidt, Wilhelm (1931) The Origin and Growth of Religion, London: Methuen and Company. A controversial but very interesting defense of the view that monotheism is the earliest religion.

Smart, Ninian (1960) A Dialogue of Religions, London: SCM Press. Presents the views of various religions on central topics in the form of a dialogue.

Smart, Ninian (1964) Doctrine and Argument in Indian Philosophy, London: Allen and Unwin. Clear and comprehensive presentation of the basic claims of different Indian philosophical systems.

CHAPTER 4

What sorts of religious experience are there?

Structure and content

Descriptions

Criteria and their application

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

What sorts of religious experience are there?

Structure and content

The interest of religious experiences for the philosophy of religion lies in whatever potential they may have for providing information about what there is. Those who think that there are experience-independent material objects typically suppose that perceptual experience – seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, and touching¹ – are on the whole a reliable source of information about these objects.² Moral experience typically is taken by moral realists – roughly, those who think that there actually are obligations, duties, right and wrong ways of behaving, ways of being a good or an evil person, and the like – to have similar information potential. The discussion that follows is governed by an underlying query: what sort of information about what there is might religious experience provide, and how could one tell? While this underlying question does not receive direct attention until later chapters, the presentation here looks forward to the discussion there.

Not only are there various sorts of religion; there are also various sorts of religious experience. The notion of a sort of experience is not immediately obvious. Let us begin with two criteria for experiences being of a different sort. One has to do with structure, the other with content. Consider such experiences as feeling nauseous, dizzy, or disoriented; consider also generalized anxiety and generalized euphoria, where the force of “generalized” is to cancel out the idea that there is something in particular that one is anxious or euphoric about. These experiences do not seem to their subjects to be matters of sensing something external, something that exists independent of the subject and, so to say, causes her to take notice of itself. In that respect, these experiences differ from seeing a tree, hearing a bell, or smelling the perking coffee. The former experiences are subject/content; the experience's "owner" feels a certain way. The latter experiences are subject/consciousness/object; the experience's "owner" senses (or seems to sense) a particular object – a tree, a bell, or coffee. To have generalized anxiety or euphoria, panic attacks, or a headache is to have subject/content experience. To be anxious about the large dog pulling at his chain, euphoric at the thought of buttermilk doughnuts, or pained by a friend's harsh words is to have a subject/consciousness/object experience. This leads us to our first criterion.

Criterion 1: Experience A is of a different sort from experience B if A is of subject/consciousness/object structure and B is of subject/content structure, or conversely.

Whether there are other experiential structures besides the two we have mentioned or not, an experience possessing one of the two identified structures is of a different sort from one that has the other sort of identified structure.

The second criterion has to do with experiential content. One way of understanding "different sort of content" is to consider different sensory modalities. Since there seems not to be much by way of different modalities relevant to religious experience, such considerations are of no help in understanding the notion of a sort of religious experience. An easily formulated criterion concerns what philosophers sometimes call hedonic content – the pleasantness or unpleasantness of an experience. Is having the experience a matter of pleasure or of pain? So, where the different hedonic content types are being pleasurable, being painful, and being neutral regarding pleasure and pain, one can offer:

Criterion 1a: Experience A is of a different sort from experience B if they have different hedonic content.

But this criterion has little relevance to our concerns.

Phenomenologically, as-experienced so to say, color content is one thing and auditory content another. True, different sensory content arises from different sensory sources, the deaf can see colors and the blind can hear sounds, and it is logically possible that there be a world without colors but with sounds, or a world without sounds but with colors. But after one has recited such things, the difference between color experience and sound experience that makes us think of them, if we do, as of different sorts lies in their intrinsic phenomenological difference, their experienced quality. More generally, color and sound experiences differ from each other and from taste experiences because colors, sounds, and tastes are themselves of different sorts. Recognized phenomenological distinctness is here the basis of discerned difference in experiential kind.³ Recognition of phenomenological differences, of course, is not limited to noting differences in sensory content.

Descriptions

It may be helpful here to have some descriptions of religious experiences to hand before offering what is a more helpful criterion than Criterion 1a. The descriptions indicated by an asterisk seem more clearly first-person reports, and those not so designated seem more a matter of comments about what is true of a sort of experience particularly prized by the tradition in question, though it is very likely that these comments themselves are affected by reports by people who claim to have had such experiences.

*Experience 1: Moses, tending the flock of his father-in-law Jethro, sees a bush that apparently is burning and not consumed by the fire. Then, the text of Exodus tells us: And Moses said, "I will turn aside and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt." When the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called to him out of the bush, "Moses, Moses!" And he said, "Here am I." Then he [God] said, "Do not come near; put off your shoes from your feet, for the place on which you are standing is holy ground." And he said, "I am the God of your Father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob." And Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look at God.
(Exodus 3: 3–6)

*Experience 2: In the year that King Uzziah died I saw the Lord, high and holy and lifted up; and his train filled the temple. Above him stood the seraphim; each had six wings: with two he covered his face, and with two he covered his feet, and with two he flew. And one called to another and said: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory." And the foundations of the thresholds shook at the voice of him who called, and the house was filled with smoke. And I said: "Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for my eyes have seen the king, the Lord of hosts!" Then flew one of the seraphims to me, having in his hand a burning coal which he had taken with tongs from the altar. And he touched my mouth, and said: "Behold, this has touched your lips; your guilt is taken away, and your sin forgiven." And I heard the Lord saying, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" Then I said, "Here I am! Send me." And he said, "Go..."

(Isaiah 6:1–9)

*Experience 3: I [John] was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard behind me a loud voice like a trumpet saying, "Write what you see in a book and send it to the seven churches . . . Then I turned to see the voice that was speaking to me, and on turning I saw seven golden lampstands, and in the midst of the lampstands one like a son of man, clothed with a long robe and with a golden girdle round his breast; his head and his hair were white as wool, white as snow; his eyes were like a flame of fire, his feet were like burnished bronze, refined as in a furnace, and his voice was like the sound of many waters; in his right hand he held seven stars, from his mouth issued a sharp two-edged sword, and his face was like the sun shining in full strength. When I saw him, I fell at his feet as though dead. But he laid his right hand upon me, saying "Fear not, I am the first and the last, and the living one; I died, and behold I am alive forevermore, and I have the keys of Death and Hades."

(Revelation 1:10–18)

*Experience 4: Father of all, Master supreme, Power supreme in all the worlds, Who is like thee? Who is beyond thee? I bow before thee. I prostrate before thee, and I beg thy grace, O glorious Lord. As a father to his son, as a friend to his friend, as a lover to his lover, be gracious unto me, O God. In a vision I have seen what no man has seen before; I rejoice in exultation, and yet my heart trembles with fear. Have mercy upon me, Lord of Gods, refuge of the whole universe: show me again thine own human form. I yearn to see thee again with thy crown and scepter and circle. Show thyself to me in thine own four-armed form, thou of arms infinite, Infinite Form.

(Bhagavagita [Song of the Blessed Lord] Chapter 11, paragraphs 43–6)

Experience 5: This monk life leads to complete detachment, to freedom from desire, to peace, to superknowledge, to the highest insight, to nibbana.

(Digha Nikaya II, 251)

Experience 6: This is peace, this is the highest, namely the calming of the activities, the rejection of all attachment, the destruction of craving, the freedom from desire, nibbana.

(Anguttara Nikaya V, 110)

Experience 7: Freedom from pride, restraint of thirst, uprooting of attachment, cutting off of the cycle of existences, destruction of craving, freedom from desire, ceasing, nibbana.

(Ibid. I, 88)

Experience 8:* But when I comprehended, as it really is, the satisfaction of the world as satisfaction, the misery as misery, and the escape as escape, then I understood fully and accepted full Buddha status, and the knowledge and the vision arose in me: sure is the release of my mind: this is my last birth.

(Ibid. I, 259)

Experience 9: With the knees high and the head low, in deep meditation, he [Mahavira, a founder of Jainism] reached Nirvana, the complete and full, the unobstructed, unimpeded, infinite and supreme, best knowledge and intuition, called Kevala . . . he was a Kevalin, omniscient and comprehending all objects, he knew all conditions of the world, of gods, men, and demons; whence they come, where they go, whether they are born as men or animals, or become gods or hell-beings; their food, drink, doings, desires, open and secret deeds, their conversation and gossip, and the thoughts of their minds; he saw and knew all conditions in the whole world of all living beings.

(Jaina Sutras I, 202)

Experience 10: With supreme knowledge, with supreme intuition, with supreme conduct, . . . with supreme uprightness, with supreme mildness, with supreme dexterity, with supreme patience, with supreme freedom from passions, with supreme control, with supreme contentment, with supreme understanding, on the supreme path to final liberation, which is the fruit of veracity, control, penance, and good conduct, the Venerable One meditated on himself for twelve years. During the thirteenth year, in the second month of summer, in the fourth fortnight . . . on its tenth day, when the shadow had turned towards the east and the first wake was over . . . [the Venerable One] in a squatting position, with joined heels, exposing himself to the heat of the sun after fasting two and a half days without drinking water, being engaged in deep meditation, reached the highest knowledge and intuition called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete, and full . . . he was a Kevalin, omniscient and comprehending all objects; he knew and saw all conditions of the world, of gods, men, and demons; whence they come, whither they go, whether they are born as men or as animals or become gods or hell-beings, the ideas, the thoughts of their minds, the food, doings, desires, the open and secret deeds of all the living beings in the whole world; he the Arhat, for whom there is no secret, knew and saw all conditions of all living beings in the world, what they thought, spoke, or did at any moment . . . [This is] final liberation.

(Ibid. I, 263, 271)

Experience 11: Mahavira quitted the world, cut asunder the ties of birth, old age, and death; become a Siddha, a Buddha, a Mukta, a maker of the end [to all misery], finally liberated, freed from all pains.

(Ibid. I, 264, 265)

Experience 12: Mahavira obtained the highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, . . . complete, and full.

(Ibid. I, 265, 266)

Experience 13: The highest knowledge and intuition, called Kevala, which is infinite, supreme, unobstructed, unimpeded, complete, and full . . . final liberation.

(Ibid. I, 265, 266)

Experience 14: He reached Nirvana, the complete and full, the unobstructed, unimpeded, infinite and supreme, best knowledge and intuition, called Kevala.
(Ibid. I, 201)

Experience 15: (The liberated) with their departing breath reach absolute perfection, wisdom, liberation, final Nirvana, the end of all misery.
(Ibid. I, 94)

Experience 16: Having annihilated his Karman [= karma] both meritorious and sinful, being steadfast (self-controlled) . . . [the enlightened one] crossed the ocean-like flood of worldly existence and obtained exemption from transmigration.
(Ibid. I, 111, 112)

Experience 17: What is called Nirvana, or freedom from pain, or perfection, which is in view of all; it is the safe, happy, and quiet place which all the great sages reach. This is the eternal place, in view of all, but difficult of approach. Those sages who reach it are free from sorrow, they have put an end to the stream of existence.
(Ibid. I, 128)

Experience 18: [Kevalins] have obtained perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, final beatitude, and . . . an end to all misery.
(Ibid. II, 158)

Experience 19: [A Kevalin] obtains perfection, enlightenment, deliverance, and final beatitude and puts an end to all misery.
(Ibid. II, 173)

Experience 20: When a seer sees the brilliant Maker, Lord, Person, the Brahman-source, then, being a knower, shaking off good and evil, stainless, he attains supreme identity with Him.
(Mundaka Upanishad III, i, 3)

Experience 21: Not by sight is it grasped, not even by speech, not by any other sense-organs, austerity, or work, by the peace of knowledge, one's nature purified – in that way, however, by meditating, one does behold him who is without parts.

(Ibid. III, i, 8)

Experience 22: That which is the finest essence – the whole world has that as its self. That is Reality. That is Atman. That art thou.

(Chandogya Upanishad VI, ix, 4)

Experience 23: Now, when one is sound asleep, composed, serene, and knows no dreams – that is the self [Atman] . . . that is the immortal, the fearless. That is Brahman.

(Ibid. VIII, xi, 1)

Experience 24: Then Usasta Cakkayan questioned him. “Yajnavalkya,” said he, “explain to me who is Brahman present and not beyond our ken, him who is the self in all things.” [Yajnavalkya replies:] Verily, he is the great, unborn self, who is this (person) consisting of knowledge among the senses. In the space within the heart lies the ruler, the lord of all, the king of all.

(Bṛhadaranyaka Upanishad III, iv, 1)

Criteria and their application

Tim's experience of at least seeming to see a whale is veridical if there is the whale Tim seems to see, and he sees it. Mia's experience of at least seeming to hear the bell ringing is veridical if the bell is ringing, and Mia hears it. Now consider:

Criterion 2: Experience A is of a different sort from experience B if: (i) experience A is veridical, then X exists; (ii) experience B is veridical, then Y exists; and (iii) X exists, and Y exists, then X and Y belong to different fundamental kinds.

Understanding Criterion 2 obviously requires our being able to make sense of the notion of fundamentally different kinds. We may as well define this notion in a way relevant to our overall concerns.

Part of this task is easy. Consider this criterion of beings of fundamentally different kinds (FDK):

Being X is of a fundamentally different kind from being Y if (i) X has the property⁴ existing independent of anything else or not depending on anything else for existence and Y has the property existing dependent on something else or depending on something else for existence; (ii) X has the property being immaterial and Y has the property being material; (iii) X has the property being alive and Y has the property not being alive;⁵ (iv) X has the property being capable of consciousness and Y has the property not being capable of consciousness; (v) X has the property being capable of self-consciousness and Y has the property not being capable of self-consciousness; (vi) X has the property being capable of being a moral agent and Y has the property not being capable of being a moral agent.

Obviously FDK is open-ended; one can think of additions – for example being abstract and being concrete. But the important general idea is clear enough; there are stateable differences in property that constitute differences in kind or sort, and some at least of these are fairly readily recognizable. Further, experiences differing in any of the ways that FDK describes are sufficient for them to be of different kinds.

The next question concerns whether understanding Criterion 2 along the lines of FDK will allow us to distinguish between different sorts of experiences. Let us look at our descriptions of religious experiences. Experiences i through 4 naturally fall together; in each case the subject at least seems to experience a being distinct from experience and experiencer – each is subject/consciousness/object in structure.

An interesting if incidental feature of the fourth description is that the being who at least seems to be experienced is said to have a thousand arms. This sort of description will go down better in Delhi than in Detroit, where the notion of something having a thousand arms will be associated with things that exterminators exterminate. Considerable difference in metaphor need not be accompanied by considerable difference in doctrine; Old Testament writers refer to God as having “a strong right arm” and the Bhagavadgita refers to Brahman as having a thousand arms, but both have in mind divine power; indeed, divine omnipotence.

In any case, the response to the being in question is worship. In contrast to some popular songs, there is nothing here of the flavor of “the Man Upstairs” and there is no suggestion of a cosmic Santa. Instead, “it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.” Leaving aside for now the question of exactly how to frame a detailed description or relate the descriptions offered here to standard theological claims (matters discussed in a later chapter), at least this much seems clear: if any of Experiences 1 through 4 are veridical, then there is a self-conscious being of impressive holiness whose presence elicits a tendency to worship. Consider, then, this instantiation of Criterion 2:

Criterion 2a: Experience A is of a different sort from experience B if:
 (i) A is veridical, there is a self-conscious being of impressive holiness whose presence elicits a tendency to worship, whereas it is false that if experience B is veridical then there is a self-conscious being of impressive holiness whose presence elicits a tendency to worship.⁶

Consider next the descriptions of Experiences 5 through 8. Here one finds a focus on such psychological features as peace, calm, and freedom from desire, and the association with these features of a claim to have reached the last of one's rebirths and an achievement of nirvana – technically, of an experience now that is alleged to guarantee that one “goes to nirvana” when one dies. These experiences, by Criterion 2a, are of a different sort from Experiences 1–4. Further, they do not claim exactly an awareness of nirvana; the link between experiences with the psychological features mentioned comes through the acceptance of certain doctrines that provide the backing for a claim to the effect that (N) If one has experiences of a certain psychological sort under certain conditions, then one has achieved enlightenment. The evidential force, if any, of Experiences 5 through 8 rests on the status of the doctrines that provide the backing for (N).

This, in turn, illustrates a point of some importance. An experience can provide evidence for a claim directly, as my seeing my computer screen does for the claim that my computer screen still exists. An experience can provide evidence for a claim indirectly, as in the case in which observing squiggles in a cloud chamber provides evidence that electrons are passing through the chamber. Here, there is a theory that says that under certain conditions, there will be observable squiggles in the chamber that are best explained as caused by electrons – or, if you like, observing the squiggles is observing the electrons. Either way of putting things depends on there being a theory connecting observation (perceptual experience) to claim (that there are electrons present). In cases of indirect evidence, the evidence is only as good as the theory that links experience to claim.

Experiences 9 through 19 include descriptions of psychological states similar to those given of Experiences 5 through 8, but there is an interesting additional feature. There is a report to the effect that the subject can “see” his own past lives and a remarkable range of things besides – in effect, that the subject has become at least something like omniscient, knowing the entire history of the world. This is a different sort of claim – a claim that the subject has, not merely a sense of calm and bliss, but knowledge of a truly formidable range. It ascribes a cognitive state of knowledge that is quite distinct from any merely affective state of feeling. It is apparently reported on behalf of someone else (a follower of the Jain saint and founder Mahavira reports it regarding an experience that Mahavira is said to have had; a similar experience is ascribed to Gotama Buddha).

Experiences 20 through 24 are like the preceding two groups in that they ascribe psychological states of calm and bliss to their subjects, but unlike either in that a further report is offered. It at least appears to the subject of the experience that he experiences a being that is ineffable or beyond all description [see 21], or a being who is “Maker, Lord” [see 20], with whom the subject is identical. These cases raise especially difficult questions regarding interpretation. Let us note but one element of them, an element specified in all these descriptions but one [namely, 21] – that the subject is identical to the being apparently experienced.

There are various issues to be considered regarding Experiences 1–24. It is reasonable to suppose that there have been experiences. It isn’t likely that such descriptions are simply made up. Further, experiences like these have been reported by monks and mystics, cross-culturally and cross-temporally. Strictly, after all, what has been quoted is a set of descriptions of experiences or of comments about experiences. Now consider this expansion of Criterion 2a.

*Criterion 3: Experience A is of a different sort from experience B if:
 (i) A is veridical, there is a self-conscious being of impressive holiness whose presence elicits a tendency to worship, whereas it is false that if experience B is veridical then there is a self-conscious being of impressive holiness whose presence elicits a tendency to worship; or (ii) A is veridical, then one is something like omniscient, whereas it is false that if B is veridical then one is something like omniscient; (iii) A is veridical then one is identical to the apparent object of one’s experience whereas if B is veridical then it is false that one is identical to the apparent object of one’s experience.⁷

It seems clear that Criteria 1 through 3 do distinguish what, if they actually occur, will be different sorts of experiences, where their being of different sorts is relevant to what their information potential, if any, turns out to be. Further, if there actually do occur experiences of the sort that authoritative-within-their-traditions religious texts claim have occurred, those experiences will be of different sorts. Finally, since those experiences, if they have occurred, are taken to be soteriologically central by the traditions in which they are alleged to have occurred; it is assumed that those sorts of experiences not only have occurred, but have made a significant difference to the diagnosis and solution of the fundamental problem the traditions in question assert us to have. So it seems plainly appropriate to call these religious experiences. If there are, then, the experiences that religious traditions claim there are, they are experiences of different kinds or sorts.

Questions for reflection

- 1 Are the criteria offered for religious experiences being of different kinds philosophically neutral and applied fairly?
- 2 What is a phenomenological description of a religious experience, and why is it important that there be such descriptions?
- 3 Experiences that no one would think of as religious are also distinct in kind according to the criteria presented. What are some examples of different kinds of experience? For what sorts of claims do these experiences provide evidence?
- 4 What can be learned about what different kinds of religious experiences can provide evidence for by reflecting on what different kinds of non-religious experiences can provide evidence for?

Annotated reading

Bowker, John (1973) The Sense of God, Oxford: Oxford University Press. This book and the next discuss "experience of God" and social science theories, denying that we have good reason to think that such experiences are merely subjective.

Bowker, John (1978) The Religious Imagination and the Sense of God, Oxford: Clarendon Press. See previous reference.

Griffiths, Paul J. (1991) An Apology for Apologetics, Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books. Defends the propriety of talking about religion in rational terms.

Smart, Ninian (1964) Philosophers and Religious Truth, London: SCM Press. A discussion of the central views of Aquinas, Freud, Hume, and Wittgenstein.

Smart, Ninian (1973) The Science of Religion and the Sociology of Knowledge, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. Argues the attempts to reduce claims about knowledge to claims about what is believed in a culture are self-defeating.

CHAPTER 5

The importance of doctrine and the distinctness of religious traditions

Doctrine

“Truth-claims”

Identity

Diversity

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

The importance of doctrine and the distinctness of religious traditions

Doctrine

Agreement on the importance of doctrine

It is fairly well known that the New Testament contains such passages as that in which Jesus says “I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; no one comes to the Father but by me.”¹ One reads that “he who believes in the Son has eternal life; he who does not obey the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abides on him.”² St Peter asserted “There is salvation in no one else [but Jesus Christ], for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved.”³ It is less well known that the other religious traditions we have discussed have similar emphases. The Advaita Vedantin Shankara, for example, forthrightly says that “if the soul . . . is not considered to possess fundamental unity with Brahman – an identity to be realized by knowledge – there is not any chance of its obtaining final release.”⁴ A text from the Jaina Sutras bluntly tells us that

Those who do not know all things by kevala [knowledge], but who being ignorant teach a law [of their own], are lost themselves, and work the ruin of others in this dreadful, boundless Circle of Births. Those who know all things by the full Kevala knowledge, and who are practicing meditation and teach the whole law, are themselves saved and save others.

A Buddhist text speaks plainly to this effect:

If one does not proceed in this manner [to “proceed in this manner” is to “develop the understanding which results from the study of the (Buddhist) teachings”], inasmuch as meditation on some erroneous idea cannot even clear away doubt, recognition of reality will not arise and consequently meditation will be profitless like that of the Tirthikas [i.e., non-Buddhists, especially Jains].⁵

The theme of these passages is clear enough. To put them in one jargon: there is a heaven to gain and a hell to shun; there is one way to gain heaven and shun hell, and there are plenty of ways to shun heaven and gain hell.

This insistence on the importance of doctrine comes out in another way. It is not an accident that, as we have noted, the experiences that are religiously central to our traditions are typically called enlightenment experiences or they are said to yield knowledge of God;⁶ they are described as cognitive. An Advaitin description of moksha goes like this: "When a seer sees . . . the Brahman-source, then, being a knower, shaking off good and evil, stainless, he attains supreme identity with Him."⁷ The Jaina Sutras speak of "the highest knowledge and intuition, called 'Kevala' which is . . . final liberation."⁸ A Theravada text says that "The monk life leads to complete detachment, to freedom from desire, to cessation, to peace, to superknowledge, to the highest insight, to nibbana."⁹ Correspondingly, the New Testament says that "We know that the Son of God has come and has given us understanding so that we may know Him who is true."¹⁰

This feature of religion is often regarded with sadness or disapproval, an unfortunate but accidental feature that can be removed from religious traditions with gain and without loss. Such suggestions fail to understand what a religion is. A doctor who diagnoses Mary as having migraine headaches and proposes Darvon and stress reduction as a cure differs from a doctor who diagnoses Mary as feigning pain and recommends psychoanalysis. The one thinks that Mary's pain is real and requires medical attention; the other thinks that Mary has no pain and is faking it and thus offers no remedy for pain at all. The first doctor, if she is competent and confident of her diagnosis, will predict continuing anguish for Mary as long as her migraine headaches are ignored. The second doctor, if he is competent and confident of his diagnosis, will predict continuing fakery on Mary's part until she faces her childhood. This is what one would expect; it does not arise from either or both of the doctors being immoral, loving controversy, or taking pleasure in the thought of the suffering of others.

One who sincerely embraces a religious tradition accepts that tradition's diagnosis and cure of what it takes to be a deep problem in dire need of treatment. The founders, authorities, texts, doctrines, and experiences of the tradition are focused on properly diagnosing and successfully curing the believer's illness, which it takes to be an illness we all share. A sincere Christian, Advaita Vedantin, Theravada Buddhist, and Jain will differ as to the diagnoses they accept and the cures they embrace. Each will take the others' diagnoses to be in error and the others' cures to be ineffective regarding what the real problem is.

To believe that John is a sinner in need of God's forgiveness, or that John is unknowingly identical to qualityless Brahman, or that John at a time is but a cluster of momentary states and over time a series of such clusters and will unfortunately remain so unless he recognizes his nature and enters nirvana, or that John is actually an enduring and indestructible self-conscious being whose embodiment hides his omniscience and existential security, is also to think that anything incompatible with the diagnosis and cure that one accepts is false. If it is true (as it is) that the National Basketball franchise that has won the most championships is the Boston Celtics, it is not another thing for it to be false that the Celtics are not this franchise. If my view is that we are in need of God's gracious forgiveness, and that this is the basic religious problem that I share with all others, then if my belief is true it is not another thing for it to be false that this is not the basic religious problem that I share with all others. The same holds for the truth about any other proposed diagnosis. Any diagnosis is either true or not true. The same applies to any cure.

It could be contended that, just as different people have different diseases, so they may have different religious problems. In some sense, no doubt, they may. But religious traditions focus on what they take to be the deepest religious illness and suppose it to be shared by all human beings. This is not arbitrary on their part – the problem, however construed, is one viewed by these traditions as closely connected to human nature. On their view, the problem is human nature, or it is due to a universal misuse of capacities, possession of which is constitutive of being human, or the like. They take it that everyone lives in the same cosmos, has the same nature, and so is disjointed or warped in essentially the same way. From their perspective, to propose seriously that different persons have different religious problems at the deepest level is tantamount to suggesting that not all human beings are members of the same species. This suggestion is incompatible with at least most religious traditions, and there is little if any reason to think it true.

The viewpoints expressed in the passages recently quoted, then, is exactly what one would expect from anyone who was sincerely committed to the religious tradition in question – who took that tradition's diagnosis and cure to fit their condition and meet their deepest religious need. There is no good reason to think it wicked of religious believers to hold the views these passages express. Sincere Marxists, Socialists, Feminists, Freudians, Supplyside Economists, Animal Rights Activists, Right to Choose Advocates, and Right to Life Advocates hold similar views regarding the inelegant consequences of those who reject their political and social programs. That is, they actually believe what they say and act on.

It is worth noting and emphasizing that these passages are not simply exceptions that do not deeply reflect the perspectives that we have been discussing. A religion typically offers an account of the conditions in which we exist, a conception of the religious problem that we face because of existing in those conditions, and a solution to that problem that is viewed as realistically facing and resolving that problem under those conditions. Different religions see those conditions differently. They hence describe the basic religious problem differently. They therefore offer different solutions. If you think that all religion is a crock, you will not take seriously those descriptions of the conditions in which we exist, and the problem that we thereby face; they will not describe live options for your acceptance. But you can still see that they are different and that the solutions offered are different. If you think that we are not in danger from fire or from flood, you will not think we need a fire extinguisher or an ark. But you can still see that the fire-fearers disagree with water-fearers in their analysis of our troubles and in their proposed remedies.

“Truth-claims”

Religions make what are sometimes called “truth-claims,” though of course that is redundant since to make a claim in the sense of asserting something is to say that what is asserted is true. “Truth-claims” are just claims; there are false claims but there aren’t any “falsity-claims.” Of course religions make claims – if they asserted nothing, there would be no religions. Sometimes – particularly when a religious tradition is under rational scrutiny, or when a would-be believer recognizes that she thinks what she would like to be her religion is false and wants to keep it anyway – a religious tradition may be presented as claiming, and even may claim, that it makes no claim except that it makes no claims. But once the crisis is over, we are back to talking about God and sin and salvation, or Atman and Brahman and moksha and identity, or Jivas and kevala and enlightenment, or momentary states and nirvana and release from the Wheel. It is in the very nature of a religion to offer an account of our situation, our problem, and its solution. Not every problem can arise in every situation; not every problem has the same solution. The account of our problem depends on the account of our situation; the account of our salvation depends on what we are and what we need to be saved from. To accept a religion is to embrace some particular and connected account of the situation and problem and solution.

Two popular contemporary perspectives often keep people from seeing religious differences. One is a popular sort of academic quasi-religion that has as one of its doctrinal claims that religions do not differ. The other is the sort of popular religious perspective that supposes all religions to be down-deep identical; this sort of religion, of course, is different from those religions (most if not all others) that do not think that religions do not differ.¹¹ If you accept the claim that all religions are the same as part of your sacred or secular religion, you may have as much trouble in admitting that not all religions are the same as members of the Flat Earth Society have in admitting the earth is an oblate spheroid.¹²

The thing to note here¹³ is that none of these sorts of views can be made compatible with any of the religious traditions we have been describing; they are not expositions of, and they are plainly incompatible with, those perspectives. This is highly relevant, since these views are often presented as compatible with, if not as expositions of, one or more of these traditions; they are not.

The question arises as to whether, in some significant sense, all religions are really the same. As we have seen, in various senses they are not. They teach different doctrines, and if some of those doctrines are true, then others are false. They appeal to experiences that differ in content and structure; if some of those experiences are reliable, then the others are not. They propose different diagnoses and cures, and if one of those diagnoses is true, then others are false and if one of those cures is genuine, then the others are not. So, in various senses of the same – making the same claims, appealing to the same experiences, proposing the same diagnoses, offering the same cures – it is emphatically false that all religions are the same. What other senses of “are the same” might there be?

Identity

Two kinds of identity: content identity and function identity

The question as to whether all religions are the same raises another: the same regarding what? Once we see this, we can see our question splitting in two: Do all religions have the same doctrinal content? Do they all serve the same psychological and/or social function? Do all religions have content-identity, and do they all have function-identity?

Low standards for identity: vagueness, generality, and trivial results

In spite of the partial descriptions we have offered of four religious traditions, it is possible to answer the question concerning content-identity affirmatively. So long as one makes the suggested criterion for identity of content vague and general, one can get the result that all of our religious traditions have identity of content. Thus one might suggest: all religious traditions (or at least those canvassed here) agree that a person's life does not consist in the abundance (or paucity) of material possessions; here is some identity of content. The same goes for identity of function. Thus one might suggest some such claim as all religions provide meaning to life for their adherents; to that extent, our religious traditions have identity of function.

In spite of the fact that the matters on which our traditions agree are neither obvious nor unimportant, there is a sense in which the result that one gets by using such vague and general criteria for identity of content or function is trivial. The result that all religions are the same regarding content and/or function is purchased at two prices. One price is that what each tradition regards as important is entirely left out. The other price is that the traditions themselves hardly make an appearance before they are judged identical and dismissed; most of the relevant information about the traditions is not used, and that seems just ridiculous. I suggest, therefore, that we use high standards for content-identity and function-identity among religions.

High standards for identity: clarity, specificity, and an interesting thesis

What these standards should be is not far to seek. Two religious traditions have identity of content if and only if they teach the same doctrines. Two religious traditions have identity of function if and only if they serve the same psychological or social function.

Some common themes

All of the religions described earlier agree on such claims as these: human life is not limited to three-score-and-ten years on this earth; nothing that we can lose is of ultimate value (this is one moral of the Jain story); pleasure is not the ultimate good; violence is not an end in itself; there is a correct description of our actual cosmic situation, our consequent basic religious problem, and its real and accessible solution; some actual religious tradition has the truth about these matters; it is foolish to live only for power or pleasure or wealth. These are not obvious or trivial truths; plenty of people would reject, say, more than three of these claims. Suppose that someone suggests that all religions have the same content if they all agree on some such claim as a few years of life on earth under present conditions is not all there is or materialistic values are inadequate as a basis for living. It plainly is worth noting that at least our four religious traditions – and many others as well – share these themes. Claiming, as I shall, that it is false that all religions are the same need not blind one to seeing that they agree on some things. But none of the things that they agree on are what the traditions themselves take to be the most important. I will argue that in fact the things they disagree about are the most important.

Two sorts of doctrine: metaphysical (cosmos and persons) and moral

If one looks at the accounts we have given of four religious traditions, it is clear that they include claims about at least two sorts of matter: what there is, or metaphysics, and what there ought to be, or ethics. I will briefly draw out some of the metaphysical, and some of the moral, claims that are constitutive of these religious traditions.

Some kinds of metaphysics

Arguably the, and certainly a, central sort of religious experience within the classical monotheisms, Christianity included, is what Rudolph Otto, in The Idea of the Holy, called ‘numinous’ experience (though there are problems with his second-order characterizations of it).¹⁴ In such an experience, the subject of the experience at least seems to be aware of an awesome Being which is unapproachable save on its own terms, majestic, overpowering, independent, living, possessed of great energy, unique, compelling, both attractive and dangerous. Typical responses come in terms of awe, a sense of creaturehood and dependence, submission, worship, and guilt for one’s sins. Plainly these experiences have a subject/consciousness/object structure; they at least seem to be encounters with something that exists quite distinct from and independent of the experiencing subject.

The relevance of this to our current topic is this: within the Christian tradition, experience and doctrine both emphasize the role of a Creator and Providence on whom all else depends. Between God and any human person there is a one-way dependence relationship; it is blasphemous to deny the Creator–creature distinction. For Advaita Vedanta, what seems to be creature really is not strictly the Creator, but at any rate underived Being.

Creaturehood, sin, forgiveness, and the Divine Person as well, are illusory; all there is is qualityless and apersonal Brahman. Jainism ascribes to each person, as he or she really is as opposed as to how he or she seems to be, the independence of everything else that Christianity ascribes to God alone. It denies that there is any Creator, but denies as well that personal individuality is illusory or should or even can be lost in a sea of qualityless being. The Theravadin accepts neither God nor the Jain substantial soul, maintaining that all there is is transitory save for nirvana itself, the attaining of which involves not only the cessation of desire but apparently the cessation of individuality. In one sense, of course, setting aside the deep problems with such a notion, being identical to a qualityless and so apersonal Brahman and being absorbed into an apersonal state does not give one much to choose between, and some of his Vedantic critics accused Shankara of being a crypto-Buddhist.

However one should decide the question of the identity of the Advaita Vedanta Brahman and the Theravada nirvana, it is clear that at the least ultimate reality is conceived quite differently in Christianity and Jainism and Advaita Vedanta and Theravada. So are the nature and status of human beings. There is not identity of content here. It is false that all religions are doctrinally the same.

Some kinds of morality

The highest good for Advaita Vedanta is comprised by achieving moksha; the highest good for Jainism is comprised by achieving kevala; the highest good for Theravada is comprised by achieving nirvana. Our traditions recognize a distinction between experience had now that guarantees later escape from the Wheel, and post-mortem liberation itself. The highest good we can have in this life is achieving experiences that guarantee liberation at death. A key question in understanding how liberation is understood is this: is personal identity retained in enlightenment? The Advaita answer and the Theravada answer, for different reasons, are negative; the Jain answer is positive. All other values in these traditions serve as means to the end of enlightenment. In a tradition in which persons do not survive into enlightenment, persons cannot themselves have intrinsic value or inherent worth. So they lack such worth in Advaita Vedanta and Theravada, and possess it in Jainism. They possess it also in Christianity. In Jainism, persons owe none of their worth as persons to God; in Christianity persons owe all of their worth as persons to God. In these ways, differences in concepts of moral worth correspond to differences in metaphysics.

The argument here can be stated briefly as follows. Our four traditions deeply differ in their morality in the ways noted; they embrace different, and importantly incompatible, values. Two religious traditions are functionally identical only if their basic values – what they take to have inherently or intrinsic worth – are similar, for the lifestyles that religions sanction are functions of the intrinsic values they embrace. Hence our traditions are not functionally identical.

There is an objection to this argument that goes as follows. It is possible that a tradition embraces one set of values and that its adherents follow another. Thus the fact that two traditions sanction different values does not entail that they are not functionally identical, for their adherents may follow similar or identical values.

This objection embodies a popular mistake. The values a religion embraces are those its authoritative texts sanction; setting problems of relevant inconsistency aside (and if the relevant texts teach logically inconsistent values, then one cannot coherently speak of one set of values that a religion sanctions), if the adherents of a tradition do not embrace the values their own tradition sanctions, they are to that degree heretical or hypocritical, and nothing about the functional identity of religious traditions follows from their behavior or their value commitments. Attempts to evaluate religious traditions by looking at the behavior of its adherents is worthless as evidence regarding the tradition; what is evidentially relevant is what values the tradition's authoritative texts sanction.

Diversity

I would suggest, on the basis of what we have already said, that it is a plain fact that there is doctrinal diversity between religions; it simply is false that all religions are the same regarding content.

The agreement on the importance of doctrine undercuts the attempt both to represent the traditions and deny that doctrine matters

A matter on which our traditions do agree prevents anyone from successfully claiming to represent these traditions and go on to say that while there are doctrinal divergences these do not really matter. Those who try to do this may be contemporary secularists who do not care about religious matters or Religious Studies professors who think that tolerance for different opinions requires that the opinions not be different. They may be adherents of a religion that says that all religions are really the same even though in fact they are not. They may be adherents of one or another religious tradition who either do not know their own tradition very well or are just confused. But it is clear that, in their traditional forms, religious traditions take as essential to salvation precisely matters on which there is deep disagreement among religious traditions.

An argument sometimes is offered that two people who really respect one another cannot knowingly disagree on ultimate religious matters, and since we respect each other as persons we cannot really disagree on ultimate doctrines even though we may seem to. One of my two PhD advisors, who by the way did respect each other, was an orthodox rabbi and the other an atheist; both became my lifelong friends. I regret that I never saw anyone try to persuade my rabbi friend that he really did not disagree with Christianity or atheism or my atheist friend that he really believed in God; it would have been interesting. The reply to this argument is that since people plainly do manage both to differ knowingly on basic religious matters and yet respect one another, tolerance is compatible with known difference on ultimate religious matters.

The plain fact of functional diversity on high standards

I would suggest as well on the basis of what we have said that it simply is plain that there is not functional identity among religious traditions. They hold such divergent values that the ends they seek and the values they inculcate make it impossible for them to serve the same psychological ends or the same social functions, unless we describe these ends or functions with high generality. There may be some point to doing so sometimes; but if we ever want to look with any care at the religious phenomena we shall have to do so with far more specificity and clarity than will allow us to maintain cross-religious functional identity.

The doctrinal and functional diversity of religious traditions

Our original question was: are all religions really the same? This split into: Have they the same content? Have they the same function? On high standards that yield a significant conclusion rather than low standards that yield a trivial conclusion, the answers to our questions are: "No" and "No." What does it matter? The answer to this question depends on whether any of the traditions are true.

One's answer to "What difference does it make?" will depend on what view one takes of the religious traditions. If one supposes that all religious traditions are false, then the difference it makes is like the difference it makes as to whether one thinks that George Washington and Abraham Lincoln or Bruce Springsteen and Victoria Principal were the first and sixteenth US Presidents. One who made the latter choice would have a mistaken and skewed view of American history, and one who thought that all religions were the same would hold a mistaken and skewed view of religious traditions. It matters insofar as it is important to get your facts about religions straight, and not otherwise.

Suppose, however, one accepts one of the religious traditions. In one way, the answer is the same whichever of our traditions you accept. One of the traditions has the words of eternal life; if you embrace the right one and then read all the others as if they said the same thing, you will be wrong three times about what the other religions teach but you will have saved your soul (or whatever). If you accept a wrong one, and then read all the others as saying what that one says, then you hide from yourself the truth that you need by identifying it with the falsehood that you believe.

In another way, the answer to "What difference does it make?" will depend on what tradition one accepts. For in each case the conception of what believing and living the truth will bring is importantly different, as is the conception of what one gets when one believes and lives a falsehood.

There is a complicating factor that I mention in conclusion. Perhaps what most deeply motivates people to maintain that all religions are the same is that they cannot stand the idea that anyone be sincere and not be saved (or whatever). Sometimes this involves their thinking that no matter what anyone thinks, so long as they are sincere, they deserve heaven – even if all they sincerely believe in is pleasure-seeking or hatred and torture. But sometimes it involves believing that anyone who sincerely is seeking the truth and wants to do what is right must somehow make it home, religiously speaking. They think that since right belief is taken in religious traditions to be basic to being saved (or whatever), then if everyone who seeks salvation is to make it home, religiously speaking, all religious traditions must have the same beliefs. In some religious traditions at least, it is possible to respond with some degree of sympathy to this suggestion without denying the plain facts of the matter. Reincarnation traditions tend to talk here of other lives in other times and climes. The classical monotheisms talk of people being judged by their response to the truth that is available to them, and even of a "baptism of desire" in which genuine desire for the truth is taken as tantamount to possession of it. Exactly how this is developed will differ from tradition to tradition, and sub-tradition to sub-tradition, and doing this in any detail is not part of our task here. We merely point out that the connection between correct belief and being saved (or whatever) is by no means always taken in a wooden graceless way, particularly not within the classical monotheisms. But that is another story. Our story in this chapter ends when we have noted that it is false that all religions are the same regarding doctrine any more than they are the same regarding diagnosis and cure, or regarding the experiences they take to be essential to salvation or enlightenment.

Questions for reflection

- 1 What do the religious texts quoted at the beginning of this chapter say about the importance of having certain sorts of religious experiences? What do they say about the significance of correct belief?
- 2 Is the author right in claiming that those who accept what these texts say are not wicked by virtue of doing so? Can one be tolerant and accept the teachings of texts of this sort?
- 3 What importance, if any, is there to there being claims that are shared by most religions?
- 4 What importance, if any, is there to there being claims that are particular to each religion? What importance do the religions themselves attach to there being such claims?
- 5 What would a religion composed only of shared claims look like? How would particular religions look at such a composite religion?
- 6 Distinguish between functional sameness and substantial sameness. Which sort of sameness will seem the more important for the religions themselves?

Annotated reading

Carr, Brian and Mahalingham, Indira (1996) Companion Encyclopedia of Asian Philosophy, London: Routledge. Contains discussions of issues, views, and figures in Persian, Indian, Buddhist, Chinese, Japanese, and Islamic philosophy.

Frank, Daniel H. and Leaman, Oliver (1997) History of Jewish Philosophy, London: Routledge. A comprehensive volume on the nature and foundations of Jewish philosophy and its Medieval, Modern, and Contemporary representatives.

McGrath, Alister E. (1998) Historical Theology, Oxford: Blackwell. An historical presentation of the major figures and doctrines of Christian thought.

Nasr, S. H. and Leaman, Oliver (1996) History of Islamic Philosophy, London: Routledge. A very comprehensive presentation of Islamic philosophy: its history, context, representatives, fields, and issues.

Otto, Rudolph (1958) The Idea of the Holy, New York, Oxford University Press.

Quasten, Johannes (1996) Patrology, Allen, TX: Christian Classics Reprint. A standard reference work for the Church Fathers dealing with Patristic Literature from the Apostle's Creed to the "golden age" of their Greek and Latin writings.

CHAPTER 6

Religious pluralism

Religious plurality and religious pluralism

The content of religious pluralism

Some religion-relevant consequences of RP

A critical discussion of RP: Part one

A critical discussion of RP: Part two

A critical discussion of RP: Part three

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Religious pluralism

Religious plurality and religious pluralism

Religious plurality is simply a fact. There are religious traditions that differ deeply in terms of their doctrines, practices, institutions, scriptures, experiences, and hopes. Our concern is with religious pluralism – RP for short. RP is one interpretation of religious plurality. It comes in several varieties, among which one is in danger of becoming canonical. The nearly canonical version says that all nice religious traditions are “equally valid.” Its longest expression is in Professor John Hick’s 1989 An Interpretation of Religion.¹ The expression that makes the strongest effort to answer criticisms is Professor Hick’s 1995 A Christian Theology of Religions.² We will focus on the 1995 expression, assessing RP as one finds it there.

The content of religious pluralism

At least much of the core of RP is captured by these claims.³

- 1 Each religion asks generically the same question: how do we get from our present lack to a better future?⁴
- 2 Each world religion is a response to the same thing.⁵
- 3 Each world religion has its own phenomenal reality.⁶
- 4 Since each world religion has its own phenomenal reality, the claims of one world religion do not conflict with those of another world religion.⁷
- 5 Responding to this phenomenal reality is, so far as we can tell, equally effective in each world religion.
- 6 Each world religion is equally valid.⁸
- 7 The sentences that apparently express the doctrines of the great world religions actually are mythological in the sense of telling a story which elicits behavior.
- 8 The mythology is true if the behavior is good.⁹

- 9 The reason for accepting religious pluralism is that it is the best explanation of central facts about religious plurality.

The general idea of RP goes like this. One begins by engaging in an act of abstraction. Particular diagnoses and cures are replaced by a vague question. Then appeal is made to the notion of phenomenal reality. The language of “phenomenal versus noumenal” is derived from the philosophy of Immanuel Kant. Its relevance to religious pluralism is that all the things that all religions think exist turn out to exist only phenomenally, not noumenally. Each religious phenomenal being is peculiar to one religious tradition. Each religious tradition makes claims about its own phenomenal being. Response to one phenomenal being in one religious tradition seems to produce people who are roughly as nice as response to another phenomenal being in another religious tradition.¹⁰ Since this is so, one religious tradition is about equally effective in producing niceness as another. We can express this by saying that each is “equally valid.” If we use “true” here we should mean “effective in producing nice people.” We remove religious traditions further from considerations of truth if we claim that while they appear to make claims about what there is, religious traditions are myths or extended metaphors whose function is to elicit behavior. The reason for accepting this is that it better explains religious plurality than anything else.

Some religion-relevant consequences of RP

Here are some religion-relevant consequences of RP. First, each religious tradition is said to deal with phenomenal realities. According to RP, Jahweh and the Father and Allah and Brahman and Jivas and the Buddha-nature are all phenomenal realities. A phenomenal reality is something to which human cognitive capacities and the Real contribute. It is something that RP says arises when a human being responds to the Real in religious experience. It is how the Real appears to someone. Remove all human beings and you remove all phenomenal reality. One not immersed in the evasivary language of RP would simply say: phenomenal beings do not exist. After all, ghosts and leprechauns are describable as responses to something external to the one who claims to experience them. At best, the things that religious traditions think exist are like colors on the standard view in Modern Philosophy: they exist only in the sense that perceivers of colorless objects are affected by those objects. On this view, colors are subjective, mind-dependent contents of perceptual experiences that do not represent qualities in the things that cause them. RP, then, claims that Jahweh, the Father, Allah, etc. have an existence that depends on our minds and experiences. Put without evasion, RP has this to say to religious traditions: what you believe in simply does not exist. So far, it agrees with naturalism.

This comes out in another way when RP claims that religious traditions are really extended metaphors or myths that are, not true or false, but useful. I deny that there are roses if I say that there are no roses. I also deny that there are roses if I say that all talk of roses is an extended metaphor or a myth which is useful if it produces a certain sort of behavior. The same goes for parallel claims regarding God or nirvana.

Second, if RP is true, then no one has any of the problems that any religious tradition says they have. The one religious problem is that we are not morally nice. The one solution to that is to respond to something in such a way as to become nice. If things the traditions believe in do not exist, then the problems they think need solution do not actually plague anyone.

Third, evangelism is anathema to RP. Any member of any religious tradition who tries to convert someone is guilty of "treason against the peace and diversity of the human family."¹¹ Evangelism for RP of course comes under no such condemnation.

It is hardly obvious that, whatever the intent, one actually shows great respect for all religions by holding a view that denies that anything they think exists does exist and denying that what they take to be deep problems are problems at all. The same goes for holding a view that proposes replacing them by different claims that do not claim that any of the things they believe in exist or any of the problems they take seriously exist either. Further, RP itself looks suspiciously like an attempt at a new world religion which gives us a diagnosis of what it takes our deep problem to be really, though it has yet to propose a cure of its own.

There remains, then, the philosophical question to which everything said here thus far is preparatory: what reason, if any, is there to accept or reject RP?

A critical discussion of RP: Part one

It is on the face of it implausible to think that all religious experience is experience of the same thing. Neither the content nor the structure of such experience indicates that this suggestion is anything better than fanciful.¹² Thus there is a considerable hurdle over which RP must jump in order to have any initial promise. But set this aside.

Human concepts

What should be said about RP depends on which of various emphases one has in mind. RP makes various claims about restrictions on what one may properly say about Real. More than one account is given of these restrictions.

One account speaks of “human concepts.”¹³ A human concept is not a concept that applies to humans, but one that humans use. RP uses this claim, or one much like it, to deny that such concepts as self-conscious being and non-self-conscious being apply to the Real. The claim again comes in two steps:

(HC1) A human concept is any concept humans use.

(HC2) No human concept applies to the Real.

These two claims constitute what might be called Maximally Restrictive RP. In this mood one finds RP denying that even “exists” and “does not exist” can apply to the Real. RP denies that number concepts apply to the Real¹⁴ though it also claims that there is only one item appropriately designated “the Real.”¹⁵ The result is that Maximally Restrictive RP is self-destructing. It says about the Real that nothing can be so said.

RP also insists that the Real is transcendent, a condition of our existence and our highest good,¹⁶ and that to which religion and religious experience are responses.¹⁷ But of course these too are human concepts, and the same filter that stops concepts used by actual religious traditions would also stop them in RP were RP not to cheat on its own behalf.¹⁸ But on Maximally Restrictive RP it is also a mistake to ascribe transcendence, being a condition of our existence and wellbeing, and a contributor to religious experience to the Real.

Another account of the restrictions on what may properly be said about the Real is that only properties that are “generated” by logic alone may be ascribed to the Real. I take the notion to be this. Logic holds in all possible worlds. It applies to anything there possibly is, and hence to everything there actually is. To deny this is to embrace a self-contradictory claim. So far, so good.

The sorts of property logic “generates” are those properties that something must have if it is to be anything at all.¹⁹ “Properties” here covers qualities and relations. Examples of such properties are having properties, having only consistent properties, being self-identical, not being identical to anything different and the like.²⁰ A letter home from a college student saying “I’ve met the most wonderful person – she has properties and has only consistent properties” will not communicate much about the student's new love interest. Mediumly Restrictive RP says that the only properties we can properly ascribe to the Real are properties that logic "generates."

The point is worth laboring. It has two parts as follows.

- 1 A property P is generated by logic if and only if logic applies to X entails X has P.
- 2 The only properties that can properly be ascribed to the Real are properties generated by logic.

This supposedly trivial admission has devastating consequences for RP.

Why the point is not trivial

First, note the properties that RP ascribes to the Real. It is transcendent.²¹ There being the Real is a condition of our existence.²² There being the Real is a condition of our wellbeing.²³ The Real is what all religious experience is a response to.²⁴ Talk of "the Real" with its various historical associations with features often spoken of with reference to God should not mislead us here. The Real is not personal, not conscious, and not God.

Second, note that none of these properties is generated by logic. It goes against a fundamental rule of Mediumly Restrictive RP to apply them to the Real. According to this RP doctrine, these properties cannot be ascribed to the Real. In case the point isn't clear, if RP is true, the Real cannot be said to be transcendent, a condition of our existence or our wellbeing, or what religious experience responds to. To ascribe such properties to the Real is to cheat at the RP game. No amount of talk about triviality alters the fact that this is so.²⁵

Third, note that if none of these properties – being transcendent, being a condition of our existence, being a condition of our wellbeing, being what religious experience is a response to – can be ascribed to the Real, then the explanation that RP offers of religious plurality is impermissible. That explanation, stated consistently with RP, is this:

(RPE) There is something to which only such properties as having properties, having only consistent properties, and other logically generable properties can be ascribed, which is transcendent, a condition of our existence and wellbeing, and is what religious experience responds to.

Which entails:

(RPE*) There is something to which only logically generable properties may properly be ascribed and to which properties that are not logically generable may properly be ascribed.

Now (RPE*) is self-contradictory. Anything that entails a self-contradiction is itself self-contradictory. So (RPE) is self-contradictory. Self-contradictions are necessarily false. So (RPE) is necessarily false. But (RPE) is the very core of RP. So RP is necessarily false. It commits intellectual suicide of the worst sort. It has no possibly true explanation of religious plurality. Explanations that are not even possibly true are not genuine explanations. So it has no genuine explanation of religious plurality – none whatever.

We might ask if there is another way to restrict RP. This brings us to Minimally Restricted RP which says that properties to be ascribed to the Real so long as they are either properties generable from logic alone or what we might call happy properties – short for “properties an RP supporter could without inconsistency be happy to ascribe to the Real.”²⁶ Then we need something like this:

(H) A property is happy if and only if it is (i) not generable from logic, (ii) the Real’s having it is not incompatible with any doctrine that any religion accepts, (iii) there is no reason to think that the Real lacks this property, and (iv) the Real having this property would give content to the idea that there being such a thing as the Real might explain something RP is supposed to explain.

Whatever charm this idea has is at least matched by its vacuity. The Real being intelligent is one candidate for being a happy property. There are religious doctrines with which ascribing it to the Real are incompatible. So it will go for example after example. The implicit assumption of RP (in some passages, at least) is that we won’t find any happy properties. This seems very plausible indeed. In fact, the existence of Advaita Vedanta and the absolutist brand of Mahayana Buddhism guarantee this result. Causal or dependence relations between what Advaita Vedanta or absolutist Mahayana Buddhism takes to exist and human persons are denied. RP’s own attempt to be consistent with everything leads it to internal inconsistency. Any talk of the Real being what we respond to in religious experience, being transcendent in relation to our immanence as things that do exist, or being a condition of our existence and of our highest good distinguishes between us and ultimate reality in a way that Advaita Vedanta and absolutist Mahayana Buddhism (to take but two examples) deny. So Minimally Restrictive RP fails as well.

The importance to RP of (RPE)

According to RP, the Real is not anything described within any of the religious traditions – not Jahweh, the Father, Allah, the Buddha or the Buddha-nature, Brahman, Atman, Jiva, or whatever. It is supposed to be what is experienced as all these things, and more. Of course, being experienced as Jahweh, the Father, Allah, the Buddha or the Buddha-nature, Brahman, Atman, Jiva, etc. is also not a property – neither a quality nor a relation – generated by logic alone. Any such ascription to the Real – another ascription essential to RP – is bogus on RP terms.

This suggests the possibility that perhaps RP should simply drop the claim that only properties generated by logic can apply to the Real. After all, RP makes a career of violating the rule that only properties generated by logic may be ascribed to the Real. So one who accepts RP might as well abandon in theory what it habitually violates in practice. This suggestion ignores the crucial role that the claim that only properties that are generated by logic may properly be ascribed to the Real plays in RP. Professor Hick is aware of that role.

The gist of the reasoning behind the various RP restrictions is that if one does not limit RP-approved descriptions of the Real to properties generated by logic alone, one has no basis in RP for not doing one or the other of two RP-forbidden things:

- 1 One might ascribe to the Real either only the properties ascribed to Jahweh by Judaism, or to the Father by Christianity, or to Allah by Islam, or to the Buddha-nature by Mahayana Buddhism, etc. and then allow other ascriptions only if they are compatible with the favored ascription (this would treat one religion as true, the others as importantly false) or
- 2 One might try to ascribe to the Real all of the properties ascribed to Jahweh by Judaism, the Father by Christianity, Allah by Islam, the Buddha-nature by Mahayana Buddhism, etc. with the result that the Real allegedly has a lot of logically inconsistent properties (this would treat all religions as true).

Even with the few examples given, and especially if one considers the long list of alternatives not mentioned, two things should be clear:

- 1 The only-one-religion-is-true line will require that much of very many religious traditions is false.
- 2 The all-religions-are-true line will yield one massive contradiction – indeed, a whole intellectual museum of contradictions.

The all-religions-are-true line is self-contradictory. The only-one-religion-is-true line is not self-contradictory, but it is anathema to RP. Reject the view that only properties generated from logic alone can be properly ascribed to the Real, and one has either the all-religions-are-true line or the only-one-religion-is-true line. So rejection of the view that only properties generated from logic can be properly ascribed to the Real leads to self-contradiction or to what RP finds despicable. So that view is one RP is reluctant to reject. Dropping it is as attractive to RP as beekeeping in swimwear is to those allergic to stings.

To put things bluntly, it is by appeal to the idea that the Real is both what religious experience is a response to and can be said to have no property not generable from logic alone that RP shifts religious traditions from being either true or false, and largely incompatible to being useful, and non-competitive. Drop either of those claims, and the shift is without basis in RP.

A critical discussion of RP: Part two

Various other attempts might be made to state a non-self-destructive and non-self-contradictory version of the restriction that RP so desperately needs. For example, one might consider two views about properties as follows.

Natures or essences

Consider the doctrine of property universalism which holds this:

- (PU) For any item X and property Q, necessarily either X has Q or X does not have Q.

Contrast it to restricted property universalism which holds:

- (RPU) For any item X and property Q, necessarily either X has Q or X does not have Q, unless X has a nature N such that X has N entails X is not the sort of thing to have Q or not to have Q.

Property universalism is a nice simple doctrine. It entails that, for any property Q, the Real – if there is any such thing – either has Q or lacks Q. Restricted property universalism entails the same claim minus those properties the Real cannot by its nature have. But according to RP one cannot ascribe having a nature to the Real.²⁷ So RP cannot appeal to restricted property universalism. If RP accepts unrestricted property realism, then for almost every property one can think of, it is false that the Real has that property. The importance of this entailment will become evident shortly.

In each of these ways – rejection of “human concepts” as applying to the Real, the denial that simple mathematics applies to the Real, the claim that only properties generable from logic apply to the Real, the denial of any nature ascribable to the Real – RP emphasizes its doctrine of the alleged inaccessibility of the Real to concepts. This simply underlines its own inconsistency in ascribing transcendence, necessity to existence and wellbeing, and contributing to religious experience²⁸ to the Real.

Maximally indeterminate beings

I suspect that talk of “the Real” gives RP the appearance of having more substance than it can possess on its own terms. Consider such properties as having a property and having only consistent properties. They are maximally indeterminate. Consider such properties as being exactly an inch long and weighing one gram. These are maximally determinate. In between are such properties as being in space, being material, having length, having weight. These are neither maximally determinate nor maximally indeterminate. Consider what we might call Maximally Indeterminate RP according to which the Real is maximally indeterminate in the sense that only maximally indeterminate properties can properly be ascribed to it. Given the history of philosophy, the term “the Real” has certain connotations. RP takes full advantage of these connotations in offering its theory. The Real, for example, is itself uncaused. The Real can cause other things. The Real has ultimate value. Highly positive itself, it has highly positive effects. There is a problem here. The problem is due to two facts:

- 1 According to Maximally Indeterminate RP, we can ascribe to the Real only maximally indeterminate properties.

- 2 Nothing to which we can ascribe only maximally indeterminate properties can consistently be conceived of as uncaused, cause of anything, of positive worth, or having positive effects.

The reason is simple: none of being uncaused, being a cause, having positive worth, having positive effects is a maximally indeterminate property. Given this simple pair of facts, devastating consequences follow for Maximally Indeterminate RP.

In order not to be led into conceptual sleight of hand, let's drop talk of "the Real" and replace it by an expression that is less lovely but free from traditional associations. Let's talk about a maximally indeterminate being – for short, a MIB. An MIB is not a being that has only maximally indeterminate properties. There cannot be anything like that. Anything has maximally indeterminate properties only by virtue of having more determinate properties, and at bottom fully determinate properties. Instead, an MIB is a being to whom for some reason we can only ascribe maximally indeterminate properties. If we ascribe even one property that is not maximally indeterminate to an MIB, we anger the MIB police who come out and dip us in colored dye. But even an MIB actually has fully determinate properties. There are some things that are just flagrantly obvious about an MIB.

To begin with, here are two facts about the properties that RP ascribes to the Real in order to have any explanation to offer or hypothesis to consider.

- Fact 1: None of being uncaused, being a cause, having positive worth, having positive effects is a maximally indeterminate property. They are highly abstract, but they are not maximally indeterminate.
- Fact 2: None of being uncaused, being a cause, having positive worth, having positive effects is a logical property – a property that logicians in their role as logicians ascribe to things.

It is obvious that by RP rules:

- 1 No MIB can be said to be uncaused, a cause, something of positive value, or something having positive effects.

It is obvious that:

- 2 Nothing that cannot be said to be a cause can be said to be a cause of religious experience.

It follows that:

- 3 No MIB can be said to be a cause of religious experience.

The same thing holds if we try to talk of “being what we respond to in religious experience” or the like. The idea such talk expresses is that the Real contributes something to religious experience and we contribute something to religious experience. But no MIB can be said to be something we respond to or something that is a co-contributor to experiences.

It is obvious that:

- 4 There is nothing that can be said about an MIB by virtue of which it is a cause of moral virtue in us.
- 5 There is nothing that can be said about an MIB that would make any response to it more appropriate to it as an MIB than any other.
- 6 There is as much to be said in favor of moral neutrality or moral viciousness being an appropriate response to an MIB as there is to moral virtuousness being an appropriate response to it.

An MIB cannot be said to have any relationship to any sort of moral character in any thing. So when we find RP saying that the Real is what lies beyond all religious experience, or what all religious experience is a response to, or the like, what it says is logically inconsistent with its doctrine of what can be said about the Real. No MIB can do what RP desperately needs it to do. This is important in understanding religious pluralism, since RP also desperately needs that the Real be an MIB in order for religious pluralism not to be plainly false. Here are some of the defusing strategies:

- 1 Talk about myth, not doctrine.
- 2 Use the word “true” to mean something other than “true.”
- 3 Given 1 and 2, let a true myth be one that tends to produce behavior you approve of.

But such strategies do nothing to provide RP with content.

A critical discussion of RP: Part three

Besides the inconsistency, another basic problem arises. Suppose one posits that there being something X will explain there being something else Y. This is a candidate for being an explanation only if X is said to have some property such that X having that property would explain there being Y. Here are two specifications of this general point that use the “generable from logic alone” vocabulary introduced by RP:

- 1 If no properties beyond those generated by logic alone are properly ascribable to the Real, then it is no more reasonable or appropriate to think of the Real as transcendent than as not transcendent.
- 2 If no properties beyond those generated by logic are ascribable to the Real, no experience is better thought of as a response to (or as contributed to by) the Real than any other.

Further, RP allows no moral properties to be ascribed to the Real. But then:

- 3 If no moral properties are ascribable to the Real, then there being the Real no better explains moral niceness than it does moral degradation.

Presumably on RP no causal powers or properties are ascribable to the Real. But then:

- 4 If no causal properties are ascribable to the Real, then there being the Real no better explains our existence than it would the existence of a world without us or there being no world at all.

and:

- 5 There is no reason to think of only religious experience as a response to the Real; eating a Big Mac or kicking a can is as reasonably thought of as an experience of the Real.
- 6 Wishing one were torturing one’s enemies, enjoying mugging a helpless victim, or happily kicking a dog is as reasonably viewed as an experience that is a response to (or as contributed to by) the Real. None of them is at all reasonably thought of in such terms, since no property that is properly ascribable to the Real would make it reasonable to make any such suggestion about response or contribution.

So there are two points here: (i) there is no such thing as an experience reasonably thought of as a response to, or as contributed to by, the Real; (ii) there is no reason at all to suppose that only nice religious and moral experiences are such responses or are contributed to by the Real.

The second basic point can be put again in two stages:

- 1 If one cannot in principle ascribe any property to X by virtue of which X can explain Y, then positing X as an explanation of Y is entirely vacuous

- it offers a sham explanation.
- 2 RP cannot ascribe to the Real any property by virtue of which positing it might explain anything whatever.

But then RP is explanatorily vacuous. When it comes to unpack its cognitive content, its briefcase is empty.

One might offer this suggestion: when RP posits the Real, it is to be seen as itself a metaphor. It has no literal meaning and it is to be judged in terms of whether it is useful. Does encountering the RP-myth make people nicer? But then RP will offer no explanations of anything. It will not be an alternative to the one-religion-is-right line, the all-religions-are-right line, or any other actual account of religious plurality.

Questions for reflection

- 1 What is religious pluralism?
- 2 Does religious pluralism have the religious consequences ascribed to it in this chapter?
- 3 What (other?) religious consequences does religious pluralism have?
- 4 Explain and assess the claim that religious pluralism is self-contradictory.
- 5 Explain and assess the claim that religious pluralism's use of "the Real" suggests that we know more about the alleged source of religious experience than it says we do.
- 6 Suppose we can tell that some religious doctrine is false, or is even less reasonably believed than its alternatives. What implications would this have for religious pluralism?
- 7 Suppose we can tell that some religious doctrine is true, or is even more reasonably believed than its alternatives. What implications would this have for religious pluralism?

Annotated reading

In the list that follows, books that disagree with the view regarding doctrine defended in the preceding chapter are unmarked, books that argue for a view similar to the author's are marked with an asterisk, and those marked with a plus sign contain essays on both sides of the dispute.

*D'Costa, Gavin (1980) Theology and Religious Pluralism, Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
 +Hewitt, Harold (1991) Problems in the Philosophy of Religion, New York: St Martin's Press.

Hick, John (1980) God Has Many Names, London: Macmillan.

Hick, John (1989) An Interpretation of Religion, New Haven: Yale University Press.

+Sharma, Arvind (1993) God, Truth, and Reality, New York: St Martin's Press.

Smith, Wilfred Cantwell (1979) Faith and Belief, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Smith, Wilfred Cantwell (1981) Towards a World Theology, Philadelphia: Westminster Press.

*Wainwright, William J. (1984) "Wilfred Cantwell Smith on faith and belief," Religious Studies 20, 353–66.

*Yandell, Keith E. (1993) "Some varieties of religious Pluralism," in James Kellenberger (ed.), Inter-religious Models and Criteria, New York: St Martin's Press, pp. 187–211.

PART II

Religious conceptions of ultimate reality

CHAPTER 7

Monotheistic conceptions of ultimate reality

Generic philosophical monotheism

Greek monotheism

Semitic monotheism

Hindu monotheism

Monotheisms and atheisms

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Monotheistic conceptions of ultimate reality

Generic philosophical monotheism

For monotheism, God is ultimate reality.¹ We can call what is common between various types of monotheism generic philosophical monotheism, characterized as follows. The claim X is God is to be understood as entailing each of the following claims:

- 1 X is necessarily ontologically independent (i.e., X exists, and it is logically impossible that X depends for existence on anything).
- 2 X is self-conscious (i.e., is conscious and aware of himself or herself as such; thus X is a person).²
- 3 X is transcendent (i.e., X is not identical to the world and God does not depend on the world for existence or powers).
- 4 X is the highest being (i.e., the most valuable, greatest, or best).

One significant religious difference between diverse sorts of monotheism concerns whether, and to what extent, God acts in human history. We can say that God exercises strong providence if and only if God acts in such a way as to bring about particular public historical events, and does so not only by causing private revelations or events; God brings about both public events and private events, and does not do the former only by doing the latter. By contrast, God exercises weak providence if and only if, save for creation of the world, God acts in such a way as to bring about particular public historical events, but only by causing private revelations or events; God brings about both public events and private events, and does the former only by doing the latter. Alternatively, one might be monotheistic and not think of God as providentially active at all.

Greek monotheism

Greek,³ understood as including generic, monotheism can be defined as follows:

- 1 The world has always existed.
- 2 God exercises neither strong nor weak providence.
- 3 The world does not exist because God wants it to.
- 4 Whatever is everlastingly true is necessarily true.
- 5 That God exists is necessarily true.
- 6 That the world exists is necessarily true.

Nonetheless, the world depends on God in two ways. First, God is viewed as immutable, unchanging, and perfect; the world is mutable, changing, and imperfect. There being mutable things is a state of affairs dependent on there being an immutable thing. There is one-way dependence but no creation, not merely in the sense that the world did not begin to exist but also in that there being a world is not something that God chose to be the case or could have prevented. Second, God is perfect, having no potential, the realization of which would bring about divine improvement or self-realization. By contrast, the world is imperfect; it has unrealized potential, the proper realization of which would improve the world. The things in the world are also imperfect, and they have unrealized potential, the proper realization of which would improve them. Anything that exists has a nature or essence, a set of properties that makes it the kind of thing that it is. The essence of a thing in turn determines the sorts of other properties a thing can have and hence the sorts of events in which it may participate. What something can be an effect of, or a cause of, is a function of what properties it has. Mutable things have essences. An essence defines a natural kind, and members of a natural kind can be better or worse exemplars of that kind. Some bananas and some beavers are better – better as bananas and as beavers – than others. Some bananas are bruised, fragile, overripe; some are not. Some beavers are crippled, ill, or brain-damaged; others are not. Any thing has potentialities, accessible ways of changing, realization of which will further or frustrate the degree to which it is a good example of its kind. Each mutable thing strives by nature to be the best something of its kind that it can be – to exemplify magnificently what something of its sort can be. In this respect, it is as if each thing tries to be as like God (viewed as the perfect member of the kind unmoved mover or immovable cause of motion) as it can be, given the sort of thing that it is.

This view has a curious result. On it, the world can depend for its existence on God, and seek its fullest realization as a thing of its sort, without God even knowing that there is a mutable world let alone knowing about any individual thing in the world. No providence occurs, no historical persons or events bear ultimate religious significance, and no worship or prayer has any point. This sort of monotheism is abstract; it will seem cold, if not dead, to any Semitic or Hindu monotheist. Yet many of the arguments offered within Judaism, Christianity, and Islam come historically from Greek monotheism. Hindu monotheism, perhaps untouched historically by Greek natural theology, nonetheless contains similar arguments.

There can be evil if Greek monotheism is true. There can be defective things, things that are poorly realized members of their kind that are incapable of becoming better-realized members. There can be wrong human choices, instances in which persons voluntarily go against their knowledge of what is right. But these evils cannot be evidence against the existence of God, as God is construed in Greek monotheism. This sort of deity, as we have noted, does not even know that particular persons exist. No truths that might have been false are objects of divine knowledge, and all historical claims, biological accounts, all descriptions of physical or psychological reality, have in common the feature that even if they are true, they might have been false. A Greek deity is not culpable for lacking such knowledge; it is logically impossible that the deity of Greek monotheism have any knowledge of what might not have been true. Nor can the God of Greek monotheism bring about occurrences in space or time; no divine action is possible. So while there can be natural evils (“monsters” or strongly defective members of species) and moral evils (wrong human actions), these evils cannot be evidence that Greek monotheism is false. This points to an interesting feature of monotheisms. A monotheism without any doctrine of creation or providence can offer neither God’s help in salvation nor God’s answer to prayer, God’s forgiveness or God’s aid, and neither is it possible for such a monotheism that the existence of evil be offered as any evidence against its truth. A monotheism with a doctrine of creation or providence can offer God’s help in salvation or God’s answer to prayer, God’s forgiveness or God’s aid, and it is possible that for such a monotheism the existence of evil be offered as evidence against its truth. Whether evil really is evidence against monotheism is another matter; the point is that only for certain sorts of monotheism does the question even arise.

There being things that might not have existed is something to be explained. There might not have been any human beings, any lions, any trees, any rocks, any atoms. There are all of these things. There being these things has an explanation. A common strategy, fine so far as it goes, explains the existence of larger things by reference to the existence of smaller things of which the larger things are made. But perhaps sooner or later one gets to things so small that they are not in turn made of still smaller things; call these things simple units. There might not have been any simple units, so their existence too has an explanation. But simple units cannot be explained by reference to the things they are composed of; they are simple, not composite. So their existence has to be explained in a different way. Alternatively, suppose that, so to speak, things are composite all the way down – everything is made up of some things that are also made up of some things, and so on for ever. Then the question arises as to why there is this dizzying series of composites of composites.⁴ Either way, the idea is, we must appeal to something whose non-existence is not an option, something that exists necessarily. So if there is anything at all, something exists necessarily. It is obvious that things do exist; so something exists necessarily. This thought plays an important role in monotheism, with Greek monotheism offering one sort of explanation and Semitic and Hindu offering an explanation of a different sort.

What, then, is it for something to exist necessarily? It is at least this: something exists necessarily only if it is not possible that it depends for existence on anything else. Further, on a Greek monotheistic notion of necessity, it will be impossible that it change; only immutable things can exist necessarily. The items in our immediate environment change; they gain some qualities and lose others. They also come to be and pass away. The class of things that change and come and cease belongs to the realm of generation and corruption. What exists in this realm depends for its existence on something that exists necessarily, but nothing that exists necessarily can be part of this realm.

Besides existing necessarily, the deity of Greek monotheism is self-conscious. He, she, or it is also omniscient relative to logically necessary truths. But he, she, or it has no feelings and no knowledge of logically contingent truths. Whatever might have been false lies beyond its range of thought. Indeed, the only thing of which it is aware is itself and the contents of its own mind. Thus the Greek deity does not create the world, or even know that there is a world. The Greek deity does not know that you exist or that you have needs; it is not an appropriate target for prayer of any sort. There is no prayer that it could hear. Nor does the Greek deity bring about any events in history; there is no notion of providence in Greek monotheism.

Being a being that exists necessarily, is immutable, self-conscious, and knows all necessary truths is regarded as the best sort of thing to be. The Greek deity is thought of as being as magnificent, valuable, and glorious as it is possible to be. Other things have positive worth insofar as they resemble this deity and defective insofar as they lack such resemblance. God is the perfect paradigm, the standard of worth; in this sense, morality rests on God – God provides the criterion for positive worth. There can be evil in the world as Greek monotheism conceives it. That this is a religion, of course, is highly questionable. It is not easy to see what ceremonies, rituals, practices, or the like are appropriate to its core claims. Nonetheless, it is of interest here for two reasons. Understanding it provides a nice comparison and contrast to varieties of monotheism that plainly are religions; much of Semitic monotheism has tried to introduce much of Greek monotheism into its own perspective.

Semitic monotheism

Semitic monotheism – Judaism, and Christianity and Islam which build on Jewish foundations – also includes generic monotheism and in addition embraces the following claims.

- 1 The world has not always existed (it was created in time, or time was created with it).⁵
- 2 God exercises strong providence.
- 3 The world exists because God wants it to.

- 4 That the world exists is not necessarily true (i.e., it is false that it is impossible that the world not exist; remember here that necessity is metaphysical, having to do with what there is, not epistemological, having to do with what is known, so that what 4 asserts has to do with what can be, not with what we know).

Here, God could have chosen that there be no world. The world is not everlasting. Either God created time in the same act as that by which God created a world, or God created the world after a time when there was no world. God sustains the world in existence and at times brings it about that particular individuals are born or are chosen for specific religious roles and that specific events occur. A religious tradition with no Abraham, Sarah, Moses, David, Ruth, Isaiah, Micah, or any of the prophets, no exile in Egypt, no Passover, no era of judges or of prophecy, no Hebrew people chosen by God is not Judaism. If there have been none of these people and events, Judaism is false. If Jesus did not live, or died a peaceful death in his own bed, or remained in the grave, then Christianity is false. If Mohammed never existed, or was always an atheist, or was a wealthy merchant entirely uninterested in religion and never claimed to receive any revelation, then Islam is false. With room for debate about exactly the scope of the claims, the Semitic monotheisms have in common that their core doctrines refer to particular persons and particular events.

The deity of Greek monotheism cannot act, unless everlasting contemplation of necessary truths is acting. The deity of Semitic monotheism can act. The God of Semitic monotheism acts in history; it is unthinkable for Greek monotheism that the deity be able so to behave, and unthinkable for Semitic monotheism that the deity not be able so to behave. The deity of Greek monotheism is not the God of history; that would be beyond her power and beneath her dignity. The deity of Semitic monotheism is the God of history, not by necessity but by choice; this is not beyond his power or beneath his dignity.

Within Semitic monotheism, Jewish and Muslim monotheisms assert that God creates and providentially rules the world; God acts in history, ordains prophets, and gives revelations. Christian monotheism agrees, but also claims that God has become incarnate in the person of Jesus Christ. That God become incarnate, according to Jewish and Islamic monotheism, is beyond God's power and beneath God's dignity – that God be incarnate in a human being who is crucified is, if possible, even more impossible and even more against the divine status. Christian monotheism asserts that becoming incarnate is within the power of an omniscient God, and provides the supreme instance of God's wisdom and love.

Hindu monotheism

Hindu monotheism, in addition to accepting generic monotheism, accepts these claims.

- 1 The world has always existed.

- 2 God exercises weak providence.
- 3 The world exists because God wants it to.
- 4 It is not the case that whatever is everlastingly true is necessarily true.
- 5 That the world exists is not necessarily true.

Hindu monotheism embraces both a beginningless world and a doctrine of creation. Here, the idea that God (Brahman with qualities) creates the world teaches that while the world is everlasting toward the past, having no first moment of existence, it depends at each moment of its existence on the sustaining activity of God. God could cease sustaining the world in existence, at which point God would continue to exist but the world would not. There is an asymmetrical dependence relation between God and the world: the world depends for its existence on God's activity, but God's existence does not depend on there being a world.

The relationship between God and history, as seen by Hindu monotheism, is complex. Hindu monotheism is a religion of reincarnation and karma, with karma being viewed as under God's control. In response to a person's repentance and faith, God can remit punishment, cancelling negative karma. Escape from the reincarnation cycle comes by God's grace. There are incarnations of a sort – God causes theophanies or appearances. For example, Krishna is said to appear to a devotee and to instruct him or her to build a temple on the site where the appearance occurred. Temple traditions include stories that trace the temple's history back to such appearances. But Hindu monotheism does not include any claim to the effect that God is uniquely incarnate in any human being or provides a means for redemption in such a manner. God is capable of controlling the mind of a particular person in as extended a way and period as God wishes, and God is capable of causing whatever visions, auditory or visual, God wishes to bring about. Further, gods or goddesses, who exist dependent on God and under God's control, may take upon themselves human form. But nowhere is there a unique and definitive incarnation in which God is incarnate in order to redeem the world. If nothing else, this is precluded by the fact that Hindu monotheism is not trinitarian.

There are other possibilities. Neo-Platonism, for example, is a form of monotheism distinct in various ways from those sketched here. I make no pretense to being exhaustive. My claim is only that the considerations that apply to the sorts of monotheism we shall discuss apply as well to those we do not.

Monotheisms and atheisms

A different way of distinguishing monotheisms

Monotheisms can be distinguished on different criteria from those discussed above. Coming to grasp this requires learning some distinctions that will be useful, even crucial, to later discussions. Consider the difference between (NG) It is a logically necessary truth that God exists and (CG) It is a logically contingent truth that God exists. What (NG) says is (i) God does not exist is self-contradictory, (ii) there is no possible world in which God does not exist, (iii) there is no way things might have been such that God did not exist. What (CG) says is: (i*) God does not exist is not self-contradictory, (ii*) there is a possible world in which God does not exist, (iii*) there is a way things might have been such that God did not exist.

It may appear that a monotheist should much favor (NG) over (CG), and indeed some monotheists think this is so. But other monotheists do not think this; after all, what (ii*) and (iii*) do is just say what (i*) says, putting it in different terms. They are not further differences between the two sorts of monotheist beyond their difference regarding (i) versus (i*).⁶ A monotheist who accepts (CG) typically will also accept (CG*) It is logically impossible that God depend for existence on anything else. Since she thinks that God exists is true, she will think both that God exists and that God exists with perfect independence. The difference between types of monotheism – between a monotheism to which (NG) is essential and a monotheism to which (CG) is essential – is not unimportant. Here is why.

Suppose that Tim thinks that there are frogs and Tom thinks that there are not. Tom is wrong, and Tim is right. Suppose that Tex agrees that there are frogs, but also thinks that Necessarily, there are frogs is true. This is a remarkable belief on Tex's part. It entails that under any logically possible condition, there are frogs; frog extermination is logically impossible. Not even God could get rid of frogs. Tim thinks that there are frogs all right, but he denies that there would be frogs no matter what, that it is logically impossible that frogs be exterminated; he supposes that God could create a frogless world – all of which Tex denies.

Just as one or the other of Tim (who thinks there are frogs) and Tom (who thinks there are not) is right, so one or the other of Tim (who thinks there might not have been frogs) and Tex (who thinks it is logically impossible that there not have been frogs) is right. Again, of course, Tim wins. But notice the difference between the Tim/Tom and the Tex/Tim disagreements. We can represent them as follows:

Tim/Tom

Tim: There are frogs. [F]

Tom: There are no frogs. [not-F]

Tex/Tim

Tex: It is a logically necessary truth that there are frogs. [Necessarily, F]

Tim: It is not a logically necessary truth that there are frogs. [Not-(Necessarily, F)]

Tim and Tom hold contradictory beliefs. So do Tex and Tim. What Tex believes to be logically necessary, Tim believes not to be logically necessary. We can also put the dispute between Tex and Tim this way:

*Tex/Tim

Tex: It is self-contradictory that there be no frogs. [Necessarily, not(not-F)]

Tim: It is not self-contradictory that there be no frogs. [Not-(Necessarily, not(not-F))]

Tex thinks something logically impossible that Tim thinks logically possible.

Logical necessity and logical possibility are modalities. We can put the difference between the disagreements in yet another way: the Tim/Tom disagreement is about the truth of There are frogs; the Tex/Tim dispute is about the modality of There are frogs. Disputes about whether there are frogs has, of course, no religious content. But the pretend disputes about frogs are paralleled by disputes about God.

The NN principle

A final point will place us in position to complete our discussion. A modal proposition is a second-order proposition⁷ that says about some first-order proposition that it is necessarily true, necessarily false, or logically contingent. Here is a bit of the logic of modal propositions.⁸ Where P is any proposition:

- 1 Necessarily, P (= It is not possible that P be false).
- 2 Necessarily, not-P (= It is not possible that P be true).
- 3 Contingent, P (= It is not impossible that P be true and it is not impossible that P be false) express the possible modalities regarding P. They entail, respectively,
- 4 Possibly, P.
- 5 Not-(Possibly, P).
- 6 Possibly, P.

where “possibly” means not “maybe” but “it is logically possible that” or “P is not self-contradictory.” A proposition of the form expressed in 1 through 6 is a second-order proposition; it says of a first-order proposition that it is necessary, contingent, or possible.

What the NN thesis tells us is this:

NN: Every true modal proposition is necessarily true, and every false modal proposition is necessarily false; it is logically impossible that there be a contingently true or a contingently false modal proposition.

This applies both to second-order and higher-order modal propositions.

Regarding kinds of monotheism and atheism

A little reflection suggests that, since a monotheist thinks that God exists is true, she can either take it to be a logically necessary truth or take it to be a logically contingent truth. She cannot remain a monotheist and think it false. Similarly, since an atheist thinks that God exists is false, she can take it to be a logically necessary falsehood or a logically contingent falsehood.

Thus there are exactly four alternatives here:

- 1 (NG): it is a logically necessary truth that God exists.
- 2 (CG): it is a logically contingent truth that God exists.
- 3 N(not-G): it is a necessary truth that God does not exist.
- 4 C(not-G): it is a logically contingent falsehood that God exists.

What (NG) amounts to is this: Necessarily, it is true that God exists. What (CG) amounts to is: It is true that God exists, and it is false that Necessarily, it is true that God exists. Hence one sort of monotheism – that which accepts (NG) or that which accepts (CG) – is false. Further, given the NN thesis, whichever sort is false is necessarily false. Similarly, either N(not-G) or C(not-G) is false, so one sort or the other of atheism is false. Further, whichever sort of atheism is false is necessarily false.

Ultimate reality, then, according to monotheism, consists in the existence of an omnipotent, omniscient, morally perfect self-conscious Being that cannot depend for its existence on anything else. This Being either is such that Necessarily, God exists is true or else such that God exists is true, and it is logically necessary that God does not depend for existence on anything. The difference between kinds of monotheism will come up again when we consider arguments, pro and con, regarding monotheism.^{9,10}

There are, then, different varieties of monotheism, some of which we have described. There are different monotheistic notions regarding what has ultimate reality in the sense of depending for its existence on nothing else.

A few comments regarding monotheism and non-ultimate reality

Typically, monotheists have commonsensically held that there are persons and there are physical objects. Monotheism typically holds that If there are persons then God created persons and If there are physical objects then God created physical objects. The term “physical objects” here should be so understood as to include not only artifacts (cars, chairs, pens) but also natural objects (carrots, zebras, and galaxies). Monotheism typically adds that among the things created, those most like God are persons – self-conscious agents capable of acting rightly and wrongly, loving and hating, worshipping God and rebelling against God. There are different views within monotheism about even the broad details of how exactly to understand the relations between God and the world, some of which will come up later – in particular, those regarding determinism, freedom, and agency.

There are different views of what laws of nature are, and different accounts of how laws of nature are related to God. Roughly, a physical theory is a systematized attempt to explain observed physical phenomena. Such a theory will assume that certain sorts of things – say, A-type things – exist and behave¹¹ in certain ways, and that certain general statements (laws) are true, and that one can then explain the existence and behavior of other types of things given that there are A-type things and that the laws are true. Suppose simply for convenience that all the other natural sciences reduce to physics, and that somehow we have discovered the entirely correct physics. Then what the entirely correct physics included as basic laws would constitute the actual laws of nature. How should those laws be thought of?

On one account, they are abstract objects – propositions of some such form as (L1) If A-type things exist and condition C obtains, then B-type things will exist or (L2) If A-type things behave in way W1, and condition C holds, then B-type things will behave in way W2*. On this view, true statements of forms (L1) and (L2) will be necessary truths. God’s role in creation will not be deciding what laws are true, but rather of deciding whether A-type and B-type things shall exist, and whether conditions C and C* will obtain. Thus if it is a law that *Water freezes at 32 degrees*¹² then, on the present account, If there is water then it freezes at 32 degrees is a necessary truth, and what is up to God is whether There is water and It is 32 degrees where water exists are ever true.

On what is sometimes thought of as another account, laws of nature are truths about the dispositions of natural objects. If water is what this glass contains, then – the idea is – it is an essential feature of the stuff in this glass that it freezes at 32 degrees.¹³ Natural laws reflect the essential properties of natural objects and what happens to things with such properties in various environments. But on this account too If there is water then it freezes at 32 degrees is a necessary truth. If God creates water, God creates something which freezes at 32 degrees.

On either account, there might be considerable choice of what universe, if any, is created. The laws in question are expressed as conditionals or statements of the form If A then C. What holds that A place is the antecedent and what occupies the C place is the consequent. On the first view described, there might be various ways of putting individual laws together into logically consistent groupings such that a universe could be created containing the things referred to in the antecedents of these particular laws. There would be as many choices between orderly worlds as there were such sets of laws. On the second way of putting things, a similar result arises. The essence of some object is the set of properties necessary and sufficient for its existence as possessing a nature it cannot exist without and the existence of which in an object suffices to identify a kind.¹⁴ Let an essence description be a description of a universe in which one or more logically compatible kinds of things co-existed. Every essence description would pick out a different world that God might create.

There are other conceptions of laws, or perhaps of conceptions on which there really aren't any laws. On another view, for example, what we call laws are only generalizations that we may discover to be strictly false though still fairly accurate, and that there is no more to a law than that – a typically accurate generalization which may well be false, and in any case is as explanatorily deep as things get. On this view, explaining why some generalizations are accurate and others are not is not going to be possible – not at any rate for the class of generalizations that have the widest scope.

There seems to be good reason to think that there are basic laws that are probabilistic – laws of the form (L1*) If A-type things exist, and condition C obtains, then the probability of a B-type thing existing is .987 or (L2*) If A-type things behave in way W1, and condition C holds, then the probability of B-type things then behaving in way W2 is between .997 and .999.*

The philosophical interest of such matters, insofar as they relate to monotheism, has to do with how different notions of the relations between God and the world, and of God and laws of nature, relate to questions about creation, determinism, freedom, and responsibility – matters for later reflection.

Questions for reflection

- 1 What are the basic tenets of Greek monotheism? Does Greek monotheism serve as a sort of minimal monotheism, a possible philosophical position, with no religious importance, or is it a religion?
- 2 What are the basic tenets of Semitic monotheism? How do the different Semitic monotheisms differ? From the perspective of these traditions, how religiously important are the differences?

- 3 What are the basic tenets of Hindu monotheism?
- 4 Discuss what can be said for, and what can be said against, this claim: Since Hindu monotheism makes no claim about historical persons or events religiously essential, it is as much like Greek monotheism as it is like Semitic monotheism.
- 5 What is a modal proposition? Why must a modal proposition be a necessary truth if it is true, and a necessary falsehood if it is false?
- 6 Explain the following claim: there are two versions of monotheism, and two versions of atheism, and at least one version of each is necessarily false.

Annotated reading

Cohn-Sherbok, Daniel (1996) Medieval Jewish Philosophy, Surrey: Curzon. Brief, good discussion of perhaps the most flourishing period of Jewish philosophy.

Davidson, Herbert (1987) Proofs for Eternity, Creation, and the Existence of God in Medieval Islamic and Jewish Philosophy, Oxford: Oxford University Press. Detailed discussion of Jewish and Islamic medieval philosophers on arguments concerning the dependence and duration of the created world and arguments for God's existence, with some reference to Christian philosophers.

Davidson, Herbert (1992) Alfarabi, Avicenna, and Averroes on Intellect, Oxford: Oxford University Press. Fine discussion of theories of the mind held by three leading Islamic philosophers.

Kellner, Menachem (1986) Dogma in Medieval Jewish Thought, Oxford: Oxford University Press. Good discussion of the systems of Jewish thought that are more doctrinally oriented than others.

Kroner, Richard (1956) Speculation in Pre-Christian Philosophy, Philadelphia: Westminster Press. This book, and the next two, discuss the development of Christian thought in interaction with ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy.

Kroner, Richard (1959) Speculation and Revelation in the Age of Christian Philosophy, Philadelphia: Westminster Press. See previous reference.

Kroner, Richard (1961) Speculation and Revelation in Modern Philosophy, Philadelphia: Westminster Press. See Kroner (1956) comment.

Leaman, Oliver (1985) An Introduction to Medieval Islamic Philosophy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. Fairly brief, good discussion of perhaps the most flourishing period of Islamic philosophy.

Lipner, Julius (1986) The Face of Truth, Albany: SUNY Press. Fine explanation of the thought of the Hindu theologian-philosopher Ramanuja.

Lott, Eric (1976) God and the Universe in the Vedantic Theology of Ramanuja, Madras: Ramanuja Research Society. Another fine discussion of Ramanuja.

Lott, Eric (1980) Vedantic Approaches to God, London: Macmillan. Excellent discussion of the three major figures of Hindu Vedantic thought: Shankara, Ramanuja, Madhva.

McGrath, Alister (1994) Christian Theology, Oxford: Blackwell. Good historical discussion of the types and themes and Christian thought.

Watt, W. Montgomery (1973) The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press. Good discussion of early Islamic philosophy.

CHAPTER 8

Nonmonotheistic conceptions of ultimate reality

Advaita Vedanta Hinduism

Jainism and Buddhism

Conclusion

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Nonmonotheistic conceptions of ultimate reality

Jainism has basically one account of ultimate reality; there are (and always have been) persons and there are (and always have been) the physical elements of which observable physical things are composed. There is no deity on which either depend for existence or arrangement. The Jain tradition is doctrinally homogeneous, so there is no need to say that it is this rather than that type of Jainism that is being described.

The Buddhist traditions range from the Theravada view, described here, through the Absolutism that is part of Mahayana and the at least nearly monotheistic perspective of Pure Land. For the moment, let us leave nirvana out of the account. Theravada Buddhism holds that (besides nirvana) what there is encompasses only momentary, dependent things. These things are¹ momentary states, some mental and some physical (some involving consciousness, some not). Much of later Buddhism accepts only mental states. These two claims² are as nearly orthodoxly Buddhist as anything; those who denied them were regarded as heretics. Everything is radically impermanent, transitory, fleeting; nothing exists independent of other things.

Advaita Vedanta Hinduism is itself a variety of Absolutism, which we will describe in contrast to the non-Absolutist views of two other varieties of Vedantic Hinduism. Advaita Absolutism holds that all that exists is qualityless Brahman. There is one thing, not many, and this one thing of course stands in no relation to any other thing. Nor does this one thing have any qualities whatever.

The task before us in this chapter, then, is to come to understand these three quite different, but all nonmonotheistic, accounts of what there is. Since Advaita Vedanta is perhaps best understood in contrast with the other varieties of Vedanta, which are monotheistic, beginning with it provides the easiest transition from the discussion of the previous chapter.

Advaita Vedanta Hinduism

Three major philosophers of Vedantic persuasion, with generally suggested dates, are Shankara (788–820CE), Ramanuja (1017–1137CE), and Madhva (1197–1276CE). Shankara holds to Advaita Vedanta or Unqualified Non-Dualism; Ramanuja holds to Vsistadvaita or Qualified Non-Dualism; Madhva holds to Dvaita or Unqualified Dualism.

It may be helpful to understand Shankara's views in contrast to those of Ramanuja and Madhva. Let the world be all bodies and all minds other than God. Ramanuja holds that God and the world are in a relationship of asymmetric dependence – the world depends on God but not God on the world. He then takes the world to be God's body in a somewhat technical sense of body. The world is God's body in the sense that God can affect any part of the world without having to do so by affecting some other part of it. One might think of one's own body as the part of the physical world that one can move without having to move anything else in order to move it; in order otherwise to affect the physical world, one has to move one's body. All dependent minds and bodies are related in this way to God; for any mind or any body, God can affect it without having to make use of some other mind or body in order to do so. Madhva rejects the notion that the world is God's body, thinking that this makes it sound as if God were dependent for existence and/or action on the world, whereas he holds that God exists independently and is capable of thought without needing any world for his self-conscious activities. Strictly, the disagreement between Ramanuja and Madhva here seems to lie in how one is to understand the notion of God's body; understood as Madhva takes it, Ramanuja too would reject the idea.

What Ramanuja and Madhva have in common – the notion that there exists an independent God and a dependent world – Shankara rejects. What exists for Shankara is nirguna or qualityless Brahman, though what appears to exist is a multiplicity of physical objects and persons and a personal God. Shankara sometimes explains his view by using analogies with sensory perception. For example, suppose it is the case that:

- 1 There is no man in the shadows.
- 2 Bimal (a typical perceiver) sincerely reports, based on his sensory experience, "I see a man in the shadows."
- 3 What really is in the shadows is only a coat hanging on a hook.

Then

- 4 There is something that Bimal sees.

- 5 What Bimal sees does not have the nature and properties that Bimal sees it as having.

The standard Indian examples are seeing a conch shell and mistaking it for silver and seeing a rope and mistaking it for a snake; each of these follows the (1) through (5) pattern. Analogously, then, the Advaita Vedantin claims, when one reports, based on one's sensory experience, that there is an experience-independent physical thing, it is nonetheless true that there exists nothing sensory. As there was no man who Bimal saw, but only a coat hanging on a hook, so there is no tree or table (or any other object) that anyone senses, but only qualityless Brahman. Strictly, the analogy does not work; taking one thing for another is very different from sheer hallucination. But the negative idea is clear – it is denied that there is a mind-independent physical world. This by itself would yield only idealism – the view that there are minds and experiences with sensory content, but no mind-independent objects of sensory experiences. Shankara's view is much more radical. He claims that there are neither minds nor experiences; there is only Brahman without qualities. All experience of physical objects or of self is illusory. It is not an illusion caused by Brahman; that would require that there be effects that were not identical to Brahman. Of course Brahman itself cannot be subject to illusion (that would be a limitation).

One should not suppose that Shankara is unaware of the very considerable difficulties of his view. Consider these passages by him:

- 1 To refute the self is impossible, for he who tries to refute it is the self.³
- 2 Only a deluded man could entertain the idea that he does not exist.⁴

The idea is that while it may be possible without self-refutation to deny that there are physical objects distinct from one's sensory experience, it is not possible without self-refutation to deny that one exists oneself.⁵ Shankara then turns to the task of developing a perspective that he regards as fully consistent with certain central Upanishadic texts, particularly one that says simply "Thou art That" (the individual person is identical to Brahman). Taking this and other texts literally, Shankara opts for the view that only Brahman-without-qualities exists. He holds that if I exist, then – contrary to all sorts of powerful considerations – I am Brahman.

The Vedas and Upanishads, along with traditional commentaries on these documents, are the sacred texts of Hinduism. Vedanta means "end of the Vedas" – the tradition that faithfully follows the Vedic teachings. Advaita means "non-dual" and contrasts with Dvaita ("dual") and Vsistadvaita ("qualifiedly non-dual"), these being the three adjectives defining different Vedantic traditions. The core religious dispute among these three versions of Vedanta concerns the proper interpretation of the relevant authoritative texts concerning the nature of Brahman – that being whose existence does not depend on anything else. The Advaita reading is Absolutistic (non-dualist), the Dvaita and Vsistadvaita (dualist and qualifiedly dualist) readings are monotheistic.

At issue are various texts, some of which express the view that the soul or individual human person is literally identical to Brahman, others of which express the view that the human soul is more like Brahman than are other things. The core issue is which texts – the monotheistic or the Absolutistic – are to be read literally and which read non-literally.

Here is the monotheistic reading of such passages.

Only on account of having for his essence qualities similar to those of Brahman is the soul spoken of as Brahman, as in the case of the all-wise Brahman. Since the essence, i.e. the very nature of the soul, consists only of wisdom, bliss, and other qualities similar [in some degree] to those of Brahman, there proceeds the statement that the soul is one with [like] Brahman; just as in the text, “All this is indeed Brahman.”⁶ Brahman is spoken of as “identical with all [the world] on account of there being qualities in Brahman which are predicated of the whole world.” The following is in the Bhavishtyat Purana: “The souls are separate, the perfect Lord is separate, still owing to the similarity of intelligent nature they are spoken of as Brahman in the various Scriptural disquisitions.”⁷

In sum: like Brahman, who is a self-conscious Person, all-wise, filled with bliss, human persons also are self-conscious, capable of possessing some wisdom and some bliss. They are similar in ways that make both persons: one an Independent Person on whom everything else depends, one a dependent person who has sinned and thus both owes her existence to, and needs gracious forgiveness from, the One on whom she depends. This, again, is monotheism. Nonmonotheistic or Absolutist Advaita Vedanta rejects this reading of such passages.

Here is the nonmonotheistic reading.

The difference between God and the individual soul is due to these differing limiting adjuncts [namely, the mind and the senses]. When these are absolutely negated . . . then there is no God and no individual, but there remains only the eternal, absolute, and pure Brahman . . . Scripture [Upanishads] says that the limiting adjuncts are accidental, and superimposed on Brahman; reasoning based on Scripture must negate them both.⁸

To thought and perception, there appear to be a multiplicity of persons and things. On an Advaita reading, the Upanishads deny this; so thought and perception must be “negated” in the sense that what appears to them to be so is rejected.

What exists, then, for Shankara is nirguna or qualityless Brahman, though what appears to exist is a multiplicity of physical objects and persons and a personal God. Until we get to the distinction between appearance and reality, he is a realist regarding objects, minds, and God; he holds that, “at the level of appearance,” such things exist. Indeed, he argues strongly for their existence. But he also holds, on Upanishadic authority, that only qualityless Brahman exists “at the level of reality.”

How are we to understand this claim? Plainly not in terms of the level of appearance being the set of things that exist dependently and Brahman being their independently existing Source. That is the position of Ramanuja and Madhva. The levels cannot be levels of reality distinguished by presence or absence of dependence. The levels presumably are in some manner levels of knowledge or belief, appearance being how things look and reality being how things are. How are we to understand this notion?

A two-theories account

Taking a cue from Spinoza, a favorite among Advaita Vedantins, one might try interpreting Advaita Vedanta along the lines of saying that there are two theories related in certain ways as follows. Suppose we have two theories, each of which has its own vocabulary; then we will have two theoretical languages, replete with their conceptual perspectives or worldviews. Each, let us suppose, is exhaustive – it describes, or attempts to describe, all there is, not of course in concrete detail but in terms of general properties and kinds and the like. In each, whatever can be explained is explained. What one theory refers to is the same as what the other theory refers to, though of course each describes what it refers to very differently from that of the other. No descriptive term is common between or shared by both theories.⁹ Thus, on the current account, there are two theories or theoretical languages that have parity of description and parity of explanatory power. The entities referred to in one language are identical to those of the other, and the explanatory connections alleged in the one will be paralleled by explanatory connections alleged in the other.

According to one of these theories, individual persons, physical objects, and a personal God exist. Since the Vedantic term for persons is atman, we can all this the Atman theory (AT). According to the other of these theories, all that exists is Brahman without qualities; we will call this the Brahman theory (BT). We then get something along these lines:

The Brahman Theory

- 1 Brahman exists and has no qualities at all.
- 2 Nothing but Brahman exists.
- 3 Every atman that exists is identical to Brahman.

The Atman Theory

- 1 There are individual atmans (dependent persons).
- 2 There is a personal Brahman and so Brahman has qualities.
- 3 No atman is Brahman.
- 4 Each atman has mental qualities.
- 5 There are physical objects.
- 6 Physical objects have physical qualities.

There are problems with this as an account of Advaita Vedanta. The Brahman Theory has almost no descriptive content, and no explanatory content. One cannot use terms from AT to shore up BT, since this mixes the theories; it would remove the alleged purity of the theoretical languages from being tainted by one another. The account requires descriptive and explanatory parity of two logically independent theories or theoretical languages. BT and AT lack such parity. Further, the account requires that the theories be equally justified. But according to Advaita Vedanta, BT and AT are not equally justified or equally accurate. Thus this does not seem a successful program for stating Advaita.

A causal theory of perception account

Perhaps one can approach matters in this way. Consider the sort of causal account of perception that John Locke offered.¹⁰ On this view, a veridical perception of a tree is analyzed like this. Suppose it is true that Manindra sees a tree. What makes this true is there being a tree which causes certain images in Manindra's mind. These images represent, and in limited ways resemble, the tree. Perception occurs when a perceivable object has the right sort of causal impact on a perceiver.

Then whittle the account down. Locke himself held that, for example, color qualities were the product of interaction between object and perceiver; the tree itself has no color properties. But the tree itself does have shape properties, and the shape properties of the image must resemble the shape properties of the tree if Manindra, by virtue of having the images, is seeing the tree. But suppose one thinks that there is no tree, and indeed nothing with shape properties that caused Manindra's images. Suppose Manindra's images are caused by another mind or spirit. Then all of perception is illusory in the sense that there are no objects that cause our perceptual images. Now, one might suggest, this gives us what we might call a minimally informative causal theory of perception. It may be that this theory, while it has little to commend it philosophically, is the one to use in trying to explain Shankara's theory if we wish to use sensory analogies. Even this is dubious. On this account, which goes further than Locke's, Manindra sees a green tree will be true if and only if there is no green tree that Manindra sees. In fact, all analogy with perception has vanished. Further, in order to come to Shankara's view, one must somehow keep whittling away until neither Manindra's mind nor the mind that caused the images in Manindra's mind is thought of as having any properties. One wonders if one is then offering any account of anything. Further, Brahman is not construed as the cause of anything, and so is not conceived as the cause of perception. The most sensible procedure, then, would seem to be to leave perceptual analogies alone. In effect, this is what does happen when the Advaitin appeals to levels of being or to levels of truth or to the appearance/reality distinction construed in an Advaitin way.

Reductionism and eliminativism

Brahman accepts the claim, relative to each individual person or atman, that it is identical to Brahman. How is this to be understood? Consider a simple identity statement:

Ia Cicero is identical to Tully.

What this means is simply:¹¹

Ia* "Cicero" designates the same person as "Tully" designates.

Shankara intends:

Ila The Atman is identical to Brahman.¹²

to entail:

Ila* "Atman" designates what "Brahman" designates.

But this tells us only a little. Idealism regarding physical objects contends that a physical object is identical to a collection of sensory images. This can be understood in either of two quite different ways as follows, using a cat named "Oscar" as our sample physical object:

III "Oscar" designates what "this collection of catty images"¹³ designates.

So far, so good. Are we then to go on to IV or to V?:

IV All true statements about Oscar can be translated without remainder into (reduced to) statements about this collection of catty images.

V Statements about Oscar should¹⁴ be dropped from our speech and replaced by sentences that speak only of this collection of catty images.¹⁵

What IV recommends is reduction; what V commends is replacement. It seems clear that the idealist, at least of Bishop Berkeley's sort, wants V. Berkeley takes statements about physical objects to be true only if there are exactly the sort of experience-independent extended objects it is the purpose of his theory to reject. Statements to the effect that there are such things, being in principle false, should be banned from our theories. The idea is that the truths cat sentences aim at and miss, collections of catty images sentences hit.

More formally, a statement A reduces without remainder to a statement B only if it is logically impossible that A and B differ in truth value. Statements about physical objects can differ in truth value from statements about collections of catty images. So IV recommends a logical impossibility. Further, given the conditions for reduction, if the recommended reduction could be carried out, it would import talk of objects into idealistic theory. Berkeleyian idealism is a replacement theory. It is eliminativist, not reductionist.

So is Advaita Vedanta, and for analogous reasons. Consider the difference between:

IV* All true statements about any Atman can be translated without remainder into (reduced to) statements about Brahman.

V* Statements about any Atman should be dropped from our speech and replaced by sentences that speak only of Brahman.¹⁶

Suppose that This Atman is tired (i.e., I am tired) is true. It has as truth conditions that I exist as the sort of being that can tire; if Atman is Brahman is treated as IV* requires, it will be true that Brahman is tired. Shankara rejects this. It is V* that his view requires. His view is eliminativist, not reductionist. It is in that context that we should understand his view that only Brahman without qualities exists.¹⁷

Advaita Vedanta will receive further description when we come later to ask what considerations have been offered on its behalf. In philosophy, understanding a view and understanding what can be said for and against it are not separate enterprises; they are intrinsically related, part of a single enterprise of understanding. What can be concluded thus far is that analogies to perception and theories of perception seem not helpful in coming to terms with the core of the philosophy of Advaita Vedanta.

Jainism and Buddhism

A radical substance-view (Jainism) and a non-substance-view (Theravada Buddhism) compared and contrasted

Jainism and Buddhism agree that our great need is to escape the circle of rebirths and achieve enlightenment and release. But they differ in what the enlightened person finds at the end of her search, and they disagree about what the nature of the searcher is. This difference is both religious and philosophical, and will be explained in both its religious and its philosophical contexts.

*Jainism and persons: persons are substances*¹⁸

For Jainism, consciousness is always someone's consciousness. There can no more be consciousness without persons than there can be triangles without angles.

A Jain text tells us the following:

The distinctive characteristic of a substance is being. Being is a simultaneous possession of coming into existence, going out of existence, and permanence. Permanence means the indestructibility of the essence of the substance . . . substance is possessed of attributes and modifications . . . attributes depend upon substratum and cannot be the substratum of another attribute. Modification is change of attribute.¹⁹

We are told that there are things (substances) that have qualities (attributes, properties) without themselves being qualities. These qualities are inherently first-order qualities (qualities of things that are not themselves qualities) and they begin and cease to be – they come into existence and go out of existence. For a quality to come into existence is for a thing that did not have it to come to have it; for a quality to go out of existence is for a thing that did have it to come to have it no longer (this is what it is for substances to undergo modifications). When things undergo modification (change of attribute) in the sense that they gain and lose qualities, they remain the same things (enjoy permanence) throughout the modifications that they undergo. Change presupposes that something is changed, and hence that something endures through the change.

In sum: numerically identical things undergo change of qualities; change of one thing (quality) presupposes permanence of another thing (substance).

The same text adds that: "The self's essence is life . . . The distinctive characteristic of self is attention . . . Those with minds are knowers."²⁰ Among things or substances are some whose essence is being alive and being capable of being liberated or being alive and being incapable of being liberated.²¹ Any such thing is conscious or capable of giving attention to objects of experience, and self-conscious or aware of itself as agent and as being affected by other things. These remarks serve as background to the religious point of the doctrines just noted:

That which should be grasped by self-discrimination is "I" from the real point of view.²² The soul has the nature of knowledge, and the realization of this nature is Nirvana; therefore one who is desirous of Nirvana must meditate on self-knowledge.²³

According to Jainism, knowledge of the nature of the self or person is achievable through meditative self-awareness; such knowledge is constitutive of achieving enlightenment. The most desirable modification – namely, enlightenment – neither changes the nature of the self or person or jiva nor removes his capacity for awareness or his status as a knower:

After the soul is released, there remain perfect right-belief, perfect right-knowledge, perfect perception, and the state of having accomplished all.²⁴

Here, persons are enduring self-conscious substances, retaining numerical identity over time and retaining identity as individual persons in their enlightened state. Thus in the *Jaina Sutras*²⁵ one reads that when the Venerable Ascetic Mahavira had become enlightened, he was omniscient and comprehending all objects; he knew and saw all conditions of the world, of gods, men, and demons: whence they come, whither they go, whether they are born as men or animals . . . or become gods or hell-beings . . . the ideas, the thoughts of their minds, the food, doings, desires, the open and secret deeds of all living beings in the whole world; he the Arhat, for whom there is no secret, knew and saw all conditions of all living beings in the world, what they thought, spoke, or did at any moment.

Mahavira – founder of Jainism and achiever of enlightenment – is conceived as being the same person post-enlightenment as he was pre-enlightenment. Nor does post-mortem achievement of full and final enlightenment/nirvana alter this.

*Buddhism and persons: persons as bundles*²⁶

A Buddhist text tells us that:

Whether Buddhas arise, O priests, or whether Buddhas do not arise, it remains a fact and the fixed and necessary constitution of being that all its constituents are transitory. This fact a Buddha discovers and masters, and when he has discovered and mastered it, he announces, teaches, publishes, proclaims, discloses, minutely explains, and makes it clear that all the constituents of being are transitory . . . Whether Buddhas arise, O priests, or whether Buddhas do not arise, it remains a fact and the fixed and necessary constitution of being that all its elements are lacking in an ego [substantial, permanent self-nature]. This fact a Buddha discovers and masters, and when he has discovered and mastered it, he announces, teaches, publishes, proclaims, discloses, minutely explains, and makes it clear that all the elements of being are lacking in an ego.²⁷

A longer and more familiar passage reads as follows:

Just as the word "chariot" is but a mode of expression for axle, wheels, chariot-body, pole, and other constituent members, placed in a certain relation to each other, but when we come to examine the members one by one, we discover that in the absolute sense there is no chariot; and just as the word "house" is but a mode of expression for wood and other constituents of a house, surrounding space in a certain relation, but in the absolute sense there is no house; and just as the word "fist" is but a mode of expression for the fingers, the thumb, etc. in a certain relation; and the word "lute" for the body of the lute, strings, etc.; "army" for elephants, horses, etc.; "city" for fortifications, houses, gates, etc.; "tree" for trunk, branches, foliage, etc.; in a certain relation, but when we come to examine the parts one by one, we discover that in the absolute sense there is no tree; in exactly the same way words "living entity" and "ego" are but a mode of expression for the presence of the five attachment groups, but when we come to examine the elements of being one by one, we discover that in the absolute sense there is no living entity there to form a basis for such figments as "I am" or "I"; in other words, that in the absolute sense there is only name and form. The insight of him who perceives this is called knowledge of the truth.²⁸

We are told here that there are constituents that are transitory. Further, there are collections of simultaneous constituents (call these simultaneous bundles) and there are collections of successive constituents (call these successions of bundles). Successions of bundles are made up of sequential simultaneous bundles and so-called physical objects are successions of bundles.²⁹ More importantly for our purposes, so-called persons are successions of bundles. There are no constituents that endure; each moment sees an entirely new constituent population. Successions of bundles are the only candidates for possessing numerical identity over time.

Review, comparison and contrast

1 Reincarnation and karma

The Jain and Buddhist traditions share belief in reincarnation and karma. Reincarnation doctrine teaches that each person beginninglessly lives one life after another, and will do so endlessly unless he becomes enlightened. Karma doctrine (in its nonmonotheistic version, which is the version relevant to Jainism and Buddhism) teaches that one inescapably receives the merit or demerit due; right or wrong actions not disinterestedly done yield weal or woe, and no one escapes their due recompense. Embedded in these doctrines is a justice requirement: the recipient of the recompense must be the doer of the deed for which recompense comes – she, and not another.

2 Change

On the Buddhist perspective described above, collections of simultaneous constituents are replaced by new collections of simultaneous constituents. No changes occur; replacement occurs.

A further Jain text reads:

There cannot be a thing which is devoid of its modifications of birth and decay. On the other hand, modifications cannot exist without an abiding or eternal something – a permanent substance, for birth, decay, and stability (continuance) – these three constitute the characteristic of a substance or entity.³⁰

“Birth and decay” refers to the comings and goings of qualities, “stability or continuance” to substances. Change requires permanence.³¹

3 Simplicity

Jain persons lack constituents. They have no elements and are incomposite. A Jain person at a time T is a self-conscious substance that exists at T. If she is embodied at T, her body is not part of her at T. Her thoughts at T are thoughts but not parts; her qualities at T are qualities but not parts. A person that exists at times T1 and T2 does not have a T1-part and a T2-part. One might say: all of her exists at T1 and all of her exists at T2 – she is not temporally scattered. She has a life, and that life (in some sense, at least) can have parts – say, one part where she is a student in Delhi and another part where she is a professor in Benares. Her life can have parts or segments; she cannot. She is an incomposite substance, a self-conscious mind. While being alive (not to be confused with being embodied) is essential to a person, a person is not identical to any particular life or series of lives. A person could have lived lives other than the one he did live, and he has a life, and a long series of lives, without being any or all of those lives (whatever exactly that might amount to).

Buddhist persons have constituents. They have elements and are composite. A Buddhist person at a time T is a simultaneous bundle that exists at T.³² Her thoughts at T are thoughts that are parts of her at T; her qualities at T are qualities that are parts of her at T. A person that exists at times T1 and T2 does have a T1-part and a T2-part, the former being a bundle of elements-simultaneously-existing-at-T1 and the latter a bundle of elements-simultaneously-existing-at-T2. One might say: at no moment of a person's existence does all of her exist at once – she is temporally scattered. If a person could exist at just two moments, half of her would exist at each moment. If a life is composed of one simultaneous bundle followed by another followed by another, a person is a life, and that life has as many parts as there are moments at which some simultaneous bundle or other occurs in the life-series. While being alive (not to be confused with being embodied) is essential to a person, a person is identical to the particular series of lives that she lives.³³

A basic difference between the Jain doctrine and the Buddhist doctrine of persons

The difference between the Jain and the Buddhist accounts of what it is to be a person is important but it can be difficult to grasp. Here is another way of putting it. Consider an atom of the sort that Isaac Newton believed in. In his physics, an atom in effect was a tiny pellet – a billiard ball shrunk to minuscule proportions. An atom was as small as anything can get, and was composed of no parts whatever. Homogeneous and ultimately tiny, atoms (Newton taught) are the things of which larger physical items are composed.

Suppose that at time T1 there is just one atom; call it Alice1. Suppose that at time T2 there is also just one atom; call it Alice2. Then ask: is Alice1 identical to Alice2? The answer is “Yes” provided Alice1 has stayed in existence from T1 through T2. Otherwise, Alice2 is a new atom.

Now suppose that instead of being a material atom, Alice1 is a person, a self-conscious immaterial mind, and the same for Alice2. Then ask: is Alice2 is identical to Alice1? The answer is “Yes” provided Alice1 has stayed in existence from T1 through T2. Otherwise, Alice2 is a new person.

Suppose Alice1 exists only at T1 and Alice2 exists only at T2; then they are not identical. This is the Buddhist answer to the identity of any incomposite thing over time. If there is such a thing as an Alice, it is simply a matter of there being a series composed of Alice1 at T1 and Alice2 at T2 (and perhaps Alice3 at T3, and so on). An Alice over time is a series of momentary Alices-at-one-time.

The difference, then, is that on a Jain account a person is one incomposite thing that exists over time – that endures through a series of times – whereas on a Buddhist account a person is a series of composite things no one of which exists over time.

The importance of the accounts of persons

To one trained in contemporary academic contexts, it may seem unlikely if not wildly implausible that issues in metaphysics, and disputes about such issues, be taken to be of central religious importance – to be viewed as matters centrally affecting salvation or enlightenment versus damnation or ignorance. But of course we do not get to decide these things; the indigenous authors and interpreters of normative texts, and the participants in the relevant rites and institutions related thereto, decide them. Thus on both Jain and Buddhist accounts of the matter, getting these metaphysical matters right³⁴ is central to becoming, and constitutive of being, enlightened. Further, from a Jain perspective, the Buddhist account ascribes too little (essentially, nothing) to being a person for any enlightenment to be possible, and from a Buddhist perspective the Jain account ascribes too much to being a person for enlightenment to be possible. One might say: the Buddhist thinks the Jain soul is too heavy to ride safely in the Great Vehicle and the Jain thinks the Buddhist (non-)soul too frail to get in the boat.

Some consequences

1 Action

Suppose that, as we would ordinarily say, Jamie fires three shots at Josie in order to scare her into revealing where her parents have hidden their life savings – shot 1 at time T1, shot 2 at time T2, shot 3 at time T3. On the bundle account, what fired shot 1 was a simultaneous bundle that exists only at T1; similarly for shot 2 and a simultaneous bundle that exists only at T2 as well as shot 3 and a simultaneous bundle that exists only at T3. One “element” fires shot 1, another fires shot 2, another fires shot 3. No simultaneous bundle fires all three shots. A succession of bundles fires shots only insofar as its simultaneous-bundle members fire shots; it just is those members. On a Jain account, a self-conscious substance fires the three shots – Jamie is numerically the same at T1, T2, and T3, and at each time he fires a shot.

2 Memory

Suppose that, as we would ordinarily say, Jamie is arrested for firing shots at Josie, and sadly remembers his wickedness toward her. On the Jain account, numerically the same self-conscious being who fired the shots thinks of himself as having done so. Memory³⁵ of performing an action involves numerically the same self-conscious substance who performed it thinking about himself having done so. On a Buddhist account, (reliable) memory is a matter of a later simultaneous bundle containing a state that represents an earlier simultaneous bundle acting in a certain manner, where it is true of the earlier simultaneous bundle that it did so act, and where the earlier and later simultaneous bundles are elements in the same succession of bundles.

As we have noted, the doctrines of reincarnation and karma require that appropriate recompense (weal or woe) come to each person for her own previous actions – actions not atypically in some lifetime prior to the life currently being lived.³⁶ Not only Mahavira but the Buddha is represented as remembering, upon becoming enlightened, all of his past reincarnational life.

The Jaina and Buddhist traditions, then, provide us with a sharply contrasting account of what a person is – a person at a time and a person over time. For the Jaina traditions, a person at a time is a self-conscious substance and over time is a self-conscious substance that exists continuously. For the Buddhist traditions, a person at a time is a bundle of momentary states and over time is a sequence of such bundles. So we have two quite different views of what a person is, and thus two quite different views of what it is for a person to be the same person at one time as at another.

Conclusion

Three nonmonotheistic views of ultimate reality have been described. For one, what exists is simply and only a qualityless being, nirguna Brahman.³⁷ For another, what exists are minds and physical elements. On both views, what is ultimate is incomposite (not made of parts) and independent (not depending for its existence on anything). For a third view, what is ultimate are physical and mental states, each momentary, transitory, and impermanent. Here ultimate bears the sense of incomposite but not of independent, as each state is conceived as existing dependently on other states. Nothing is thought to have existential independence.

Questions for reflection

- 1 Why, in the end, do analogies to perceptual experience, whether simple or complex, fail to communicate the core of Advaita Vedanta doctrine?
- 2 What does Advaita Vedanta doctrine affirm? What does it deny?
- 3 Explain the Jain account of persons, and its implications for action, memory, and personal identity.
- 4 Explain the Buddhist account of persons, and its implications for action, memory, and personal identity.

Annotated reading

Basham, A. L. (1951) History and Doctrine of the Ajivikas, London: Luzac Press. Good discussion of the doctrinal content and historical development of the Jain tradition.

Chatterjee, Satischandra and Datta, Dhirendramohan (1950) An Introduction to Indian Philosophy, Calcutta: University of Calcutta Press. A good general treatment of the various Indian philosophical systems; goes into more detail than a typical introduction.

Jaini, P. (1979) The Jaina Path of Perfection, Berkeley: University of California Press. A comprehensive account of Jain thought.

Mookerji, Satkari (1944) The Jaina Philosophy of Non-Absolutism, Calcutta: Bharati Mahavidyalaya. Good account of Jain doctrine with emphasis on one interpretation of Jain thought on which it sees claims as relative to perspectives; it is controversial as to whether this reading is correct.

Phillips, Steven (1995) Classical Indian Metaphysics, La Salle, IL: Open Court. Nice discussions of issues and systems.

Radhakrishnan, S. and Moore, C. A. (1952) A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. While much of the material is philosophical only in a very loose sense, this is a useful anthology of some passages by Indian philosophers.

Rambachan, Anantanand (1991) Accomplishing the Accomplished: The Vedas as a Source of Valid Knowledge in Sankara, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press. Good discussion of the view that Hindu Scripture, along with perception, inference, etc. is a source of genuine knowledge.

Warder, A. K. (1990) A History of Indian Buddhism, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press. Standard history of Buddhism in the land of its origin.

Wood, Thomas (1990) The Mandukya Upanishad and the Agama Sastra: An Investigation into the Meaning of the Vedanta, (Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1990). A lucid and excellent account of Advaita.

Wood, Thomas (1991) Mind-Only, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press. An excellent account of Theravada doctrine, lucidly argued.

PART III

Arguments concerning monotheistic
conceptions

CHAPTER 9

Arguments against monotheism

Three questions

The problem of evil

Failed escapes

The consistency issue

The evidential issue

Conclusion

Epilogue Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Arguments against monotheism

Three questions

A theodicy is an explanation of the role that evil plays in God's overall plan. A defense regarding evil is an argument that evil does not provide evidence that God does not exist. An argument from evil is an attempt to show that the existence of evil provides evidence that God does not exist. So there arise three questions regarding God and evil: Is there an adequate theodicy? Is there a successful defense regarding evil? Is there a successful argument from evil?

While the issues that come up in the attempt to develop a theodicy are of significant philosophical and religious interest, they typically occur within the context of a fairly detailed theology, and we will not try to develop one here. With one exception, we will set the first question aside.

Reincarnation, karma, and evil

The doctrine of reincarnation claims that each person is embodied in a newly born body, lives a human life for however long that body lives, and when that body dies the person who has been embodied in it becomes embodied in another newly born body.¹ This process is, for each person other than Brahman or God, beginningless and ends only if the person becomes enlightened or is saved. The doctrine of karma says that the physical, social, economic, political, etc. conditions under which a person is embodied and lives a given lifetime are the conditions rendered appropriate by the person's action in previous lifetimes. The two claims together yield a third: what evils occur to a person in a given lifetime are morally proper, being the appropriate consequences of what the person has previously done. God, of course, is not subject to reincarnation.

At least from some monotheistic standpoints, there is an attractiveness to this doctrine. All evils are just punishments. For example, if an infant is stillborn or has severe birth defects, these things happen, not to a person just coming to be, but to a person who has a long and intricate series of lifetimes in which he has behaved so viciously as to deserve this treatment. Bad things happen to good people because they were not always good people. This view entails, then, that:

(EN) For any evil E that occurs to a person in lifetime N, E is the just consequence of wrong actions by that person in lifetime N or in her lifetimes prior to N.

Whether (EN) is true or not, it is logically consistent. Thus it is relevant to a use of the Consistency Strategy that we will consider shortly. Since there is little if any solid evidence in favor of the truth of the doctrines of reincarnation and karma,² it would be intellectually risky to offer them as part of a theodicy of which they formed an essential part, or a defense regarding evil.³

To begin by offering a defense regarding evil would be premature. One would need first to have reason to suppose that evil is evidence against the existence of God. Unless there is good reason to think this, there is no need for a defense regarding evil. While it is often assumed that the religious believer should provide evidence that God exists and also provide a defense regarding evil, the idea that the religious believer should always be the one who offers arguments is without justification. The place to start in considering God and evil is by asking whether there is any successful, or at least initially plausible, argument from evil. There is quite a variety of attempts to offer a successful argument from evil. It is time to consider some of them.

The problem of evil

What philosophers call the problem of evil concerns whether or not the existence of evil counts against the existence of God, makes belief that God exists unreasonable, or the like. The pastoral problem of evil – how one is to deal with the evil that one faces in one's own life and the lives of those one loves – is obviously important, but it is not the (philosophical) problem of evil. A theodicy is an account of why God allows, or even causes, evil – of the role evil plays in the great scheme of things, how it relates to divine providence, how God can bring good from evil, how God's love can triumph over evil, and the like. It is understandable that someone wants a theodicy. But offering a theodicy is not necessary in order to deal with the problem of evil, and it is a large topic all by itself. Here, the concern is with the problem of evil, itself quite enough to occupy one's attention.

The existence of evil is the most influential consideration against the existence of God. The fact is that there is evil in the world, and the fact is that this is at least initially puzzling if the world is created and providentially guided by a morally perfect and omniscient God. In this chapter, then, versions of this consideration are examined.⁴

It is often taken to be obvious that the existence of evil is at least evidence against the existence of God. Even if other, stronger considerations vote "Yes" regarding God's existence, it is claimed that evil obviously votes "No" in that election. I take this to be false. The existence of evil is evidence against the existence of God only if there is some sound and valid argument in which There is evil is an essential premise (one without which the argument is invalid) and *God does not exist*⁵ is the conclusion. It is not obvious that there is any such argument. Anyone who claims there is such an argument may be challenged to produce it. This chapter considers various arguments that have been offered to meet this challenge.

Is the existence of evil evidence against the existence of God?

That there is evil seems to many a feature of the world that God would not have allowed. Thus they argue that since evil does exist, God does not. This inference is cogent if and only if (E) There is evil and (G) God exists are logically incompatible, or if (E) plus some set S of discernible truths is logically incompatible with (G). Thus arguments from evil to the non-existence of God either claim that (E) and (G) are logically incompatible or seek some set S of discernible truths which, together with (E), is incompatible with (G). The claim is that (E) entails not-(G) or that a set S of discernible truths, together with (E), entails not-(G). It is possible to consider several arguments from (E) is true to (G) is false within a brief scope, thereby gaining a good sense of how likely to succeed this enterprise is.

Failed escapes

No typical version of monotheism can deny (E). Semitic and Hindu monotheisms hold that our basic religious problem is sin from which we need forgiveness and deliverance. But to sin is to act in a way that is evil. Typical monotheisms are religions of redemption from evil. So they cannot deny that (E) is true.

Nor can monotheism consistently embrace the notion of a finite God – a deity who, for reasons of lack of knowledge, power, or goodness does not prevent evil. If a supposed deity is not perfectly good, it is not the deity of typical monotheism, so that route is closed. An omniscient but morally imperfect being would not be God.

Suppose, then, that a being is morally perfect but limited in either knowledge or power in such a way that, for certain evils at least, it would prevent them if it could but it cannot prevent them. This being also would not be God in any typical monotheistic sense. To see this, consider a being limited in knowledge; suppose that God lacks the knowledge to prevent evil, though God has the power to do so. Suppose also that I, walking alongside my friend Jon, know that if he does not stop walking now, he will be hit by a car. Then except under really extraordinary circumstances I am wicked if I do not stop him if I know how, and except under really extraordinary circumstances I will know a variety of ways to stop him. But, by the present hypothesis, God lacks that knowledge. So relative to preventing the evil of Jon's being hit by a car, I am smarter than God. But no being that I am smarter than, relative to preventing evil, is worthy of the name "God." Hence limiting divine knowledge to "solve" the problem of evil is no more successful than denying divine goodness.

Suppose instead that God's power is limited relative to preventing at least certain evils – God knows how to prevent them but lacks the ability to put that knowledge to work. I know that if Sharon is getting a migraine, the appropriate strength pain pill plus strong sweet tea will prevent it, and typically I have the power to provide both pill and tea. But, on the present hypothesis, God lacks the power so to act, because so acting would prevent evil. But no being that, relative to preventing an evil, has less power than I do is worthy of the name "God." Hence limiting divine power as a "solution" to the problem of evil is no more successful than is limiting divine knowledge.

We could follow a strategy of allowing that God can prevent any evils we can prevent but that God cannot prevent any evils we cannot prevent. Or we could deny that God could do any evil-prevention that required more knowledge than K or more power than P , where K represents some degree of knowledge way above what Einstein had but short of omniscience and P represents some degree of power way above that possessed by the world's strongest person but short of omnipotence. A condition of there being a point to attempting some such distinction is that we have some reason to think that God could be justified in allowing the evils that can be prevented by someone who has knowledge up to degree K or power up to degree P but not justified in allowing evils whose prevention would require more knowledge or power. So far as I know, no attempt has been made to do this, and there is no reason to think it a promising enterprise.

Summary regarding a finite deity and evil

The motivation to take refuge in the idea of a finite God – one limited in power and/or knowledge – can be motivated by this general assumption: the existence of an evil E is evidence against the existence of God unless it is the case that either (i) God lacks the power to prevent E , or (ii) God lacks the knowledge to prevent E . Considering all the evil there is, the consequent limitation on divine power, or divine knowledge, is enormous. No being so limited in power or knowledge is God.

It can also be motivated by a more nuanced assumption: the existence of an evil E is evidence against the existence of God unless it is the case that either (i) God lacks the power to prevent E , or (ii) God lacks the knowledge to prevent E , or (iii) God has a morally sufficient reason for allowing E . This assumption involves three claims. The actual evils that can be prevented by a being with power of degree P or degree of knowledge K are evils God has a morally sufficient reason for allowing. The actual evils that God has no morally sufficient reason for allowing are all evils whose prevention would require a degree of power beyond P and/or a degree of knowledge beyond K . God's power and knowledge end at P and K . The claims involved in this assumption are arbitrary. There is no reason to suppose that they correspond to any actual differences in evils, knowledge, and power.⁶

Denying that there is evil, or so restricting one's notion of God so that God is morally imperfect or so limited in power or knowledge that preventing evil exceeds divine capacities, all are dead ends for monotheism. These "answers" to the claim that evil is evidence against monotheisms are thinly disguised admissions to the charge. Monotheism has been right in firmly resisting these moves.

If the existence of evil is evidence against God's existence, this does not settle the issue as to whether God exists or as to whether it is reasonable to believe that God exists. There might, for example, be equally strong or stronger evidence in favor of God's existence. But the notion that the existence of evil actually is evidence against God's existence should not itself be accepted without careful examination. As we have noted, evil is evidence against there being a God only if (a) (E) There is evil and (G) God exists are logically incompatible, or (b) if (E) plus some set S of discernible truths is logically incompatible with (G). But is either (a) or (b) true?

The consistency issue

Straightforward inconsistency

One might claim, as did my own Introduction to Philosophy teacher, that (E) and (G) are obviously logically incompatible. This claim is false. The Consistency Strategy tells us that if any three propositions A, B, and C are logically compatible, then any pair from that trio is also logically consistent provided none of A, B, or C is self-contradictory. Note that what a use of the Consistency Strategy can show is simply the logical compatibility of two propositions. A proper use of this strategy with regard to two propositions A and B will prove Possibly, both A and B are true. It will not, and is not intended to, prove that A is true or that B is true. With this limitation goes an advantage; one using the strategy need not prove that any of A, B, or C is true.

Consider, then, these propositions:

- A1 God exists.
- B1 If God allows an evil, then God has a morally sufficient reason for allowing it.
- C1 There is evil.

None of A1, B1, or C1 appears to be self-contradictory. Nor does the trio A1, B1, C1 appear to be an inconsistent set. But if none of A1, B1, and C1 is self-contradictory, and if (A1, B1, C1) is a consistent trio, then no pair of propositions from that trio is logically incompatible. One such pair is (A1, C1). So A1 and C1 are not logically incompatible. But A1 is simply (G) God exists and C1 is simply (E) There is evil. So God exists and (E) There is evil are not logically incompatible. Hence (a) is false. So if evil is evidence against God's existence, (b) must be true.

Another use of the Consistency Strategy goes like this. Consider these propositions:

- (G) God exists.
- (EN) For any evil E that occurs to a person in lifetime N, E is the just consequence of wrong actions by that person in lifetime N or in her lifetimes prior to N.
- (E) There are evils.

What was true regarding the A1, B1, C1 trio seems also true of the G, EN, E trio, so it too seems to provide the basis for a successful use of the Consistency Strategy.

Problems with this use of the Consistency Strategy

There is a simple rule of logical inference that says this: If a proposition A plus some necessary truth N entails proposition B, then A by itself entails B. One who doubts the success of the use made of the Consistency Strategy in the preceding reasoning may try to find some necessary truth N that, together with (E), entails the denial of (G). Finding such a necessary truth would show that (G) and (E) are logically incompatible after all. Various candidates are available. Here are two:

- N1 Necessarily, if God creates at all, God will create the best possible world, and the best possible world will contain no evil.
- N2 Necessarily, a perfectly good being prevents evil insofar as it can, and an omnipotent and omniscient being can prevent any evil.

Will either of these do? (N1) or (N2) will do only if it is a necessary truth. Is (N1) a necessary truth? Is (N2) a necessary truth?

(N1) uses the notion of a best possible world – a world that contains as much moral worth as it is logically possible that a world contain.⁷ Several questions arise regarding (N1). First, is the notion of a best possible world itself consistent, or is it like the notion of a highest possible integer? I think the highest possible integer should be named Charlie sounds fine until one remembers it is a necessary truth that For any integer I, there is an integer I such that I* is higher than I*; it is logically impossible that there be a highest integer. Anyone appealing to (N1) owes us an account of “best possible world” on which it is logically possible that there be such a thing. One that would not do, for example, is this: World W is the best possible world only if the number of good persons in that world is the same number as the highest possible integer. Second, (N1) requires that a best possible world contain no evil; according to (N1), the presence of evil in a world will rule it out as being the best possible. It isn’t at all obvious that this is right. Suppose, for example, that any world possessed of great moral value will have virtuous agents in it – agents who are honest, brave, compassionate, and the like. But necessarily virtue is earned; one becomes virtuous of character by acting rightly again and again. For some virtues, at least, the relevant occasions of acting rightly require conquering one or another evil. Bravery requires that one have fear that one conquers. Fortitude requires that one bear pain well, and hence that one bear pain. Compassion presupposes suffering, and various saints offer the experiential report that so does moral and religious maturity. Perhaps some virtues require conquering evil, and some do not. But perhaps also one who has a full quiver of virtues has among them the ones that require that they have conquered evil, and in the best possible world everyone's quiver of virtues will be filled with all virtue's varieties. So maybe the best possible world would contain evil after all.⁸

Third, suppose the best possible world will contain moral agents who act only freely and rightly, and that if an agent acts freely then that agent is not merely acting in the way God has built into her that she act. In the strictest sense, to create a world W is to fiat W – so to act that W obtains simply as a result of one's having so acted. But then the free actions of a created moral agent cannot themselves be created by God. If God fiats that Eve speaks truly, Eve does not freely speak truly. So, perhaps, even should there be some notion of a best possible world that is not self-contradictory, that world is one that God cannot fiat – cannot, strictly speaking, create – because it is logically impossible that this be done. But then it is false that, strictly speaking, if God creates then God creates the best possible world.

Fourth, there is an argument to the effect that there being a best possible world is not compatible with God being omniscient. The idea is that God is omniscient entails No world God created would exhaust God's competence or *For any world W that God created, God could create a world *W such that *W was better than *W. There is reason, then, to be dubious about the claim that (N1) Necessarily, if God creates at all, God will create the best possible world, and the best possible world will contain no evil is a necessary truth.

Perhaps things will go better if we appeal to N2 Necessarily, a perfectly good being prevents evil insofar as it can, and an omnipotent and omniscient being can prevent any evil.

Reflection on (N2) brings us back to at least one of the considerations already raised regarding (N1). If a best possible world can contain evil, why think that a perfectly good and omniscient God would not permit evil?

There are other problems with (N2). Let the partial description of a possible person (a PDPP) be a description of a set of fully determinate properties such that, were God to, strictly speaking, create – i.e., fiat – something having those properties, God would have fiated a person. To each PDPP X, one might say, there will correspond a person if God chooses to follow the recipe that X contains. Suppose that for each PDPP X there is a truth about how the corresponding person would act if he was created. Whatever the truth is, if there is one, about whether there is any PDPP whose corresponding person would always freely act rightly, that truth is not a necessary truth. Suppose, finally, that the logically contingent fact of the matter is that there is no PDPP whose corresponding person, were she created, would always freely act rightly. A world possessing the highest possible moral worth, or any reasonable facsimile, will contain moral agents. If the truth is as assumed, then in creating moral agents to populate the best possible world, God is creating agents whose choices will introduce evil into that world. Since it is logically possible that the truth be as we have assumed, and logically necessary that the best possible world contain moral agents, it is logically possible that the best possible world contain agents who act wrongly, thereby introducing evil into that world. Hence it is not a logically necessary truth that the best possible world contains no evil. Nor is it a necessary truth that a morally perfect omniscient being cannot permit evil. But then neither (N1) nor (N2) is true; hence nor is the logically necessary truth that the critic sought to pair off with (E) There is evil for the purpose of deriving the denial of (G) God exists. Nor is either the basis for a successful challenge to the Consistency Strategy.

The evidential issue

Logical consistency with evidential conflict

It is not logically inconsistent of one to believe that almost no residents of Madison, Wisconsin would vote for Prince Charles as President of the United States, that Kim is a resident of Madison, and that Kim would vote for Prince Charles as President. But if one has no particular reason to think that Kim relevantly differs from her fellow Madisonians, one believes against the evidence when one picks her as a Prince Charles supporter. Proposition A is logically consistent with proposition B and The truth of proposition A is evidence that proposition B is false are not themselves logically incompatible claims. We have found no reason to think that the existence of evil is logically incompatible with God's existence. The remaining question concerns whether nonetheless the existence of evil is evidence against the existence of God. If there being evil counts against there being a God only if either (a) (E) There is evil and (G) God exists are logically incompatible, or (b) if (E) plus some set S of discernible truths is logically incompatible with (G), and (a) is false, there remains (b). The discernible truths added to (E) need not be necessary truths; any old truths will do. Are there any?

Those who answer affirmatively take it that the existence of evil is something not to be expected if a morally perfect and omniscient God created the world. Suppose that Aunt Lucy is an exquisite housekeeper. Suppose too that one must choose whether she is staying in guest room 21 that is neat as a pin or in guest room 22 whose floor is invisible under dirty clothing. While it is logically possible that she is staying in 22, odds are Aunt Lucy is staying in 21. If God created the world, perhaps it is logically possible that there be evils in it; but odds are there won't be. So (roughly) the assumption goes. Is the assumption right?

There is at least this much to be said for the assumption: for typical monotheisms, the present state of the world is not such as to make God overly pleased. The prayer "Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven" has not exactly received a full answer yet. Critic and theist agree that things are not as a morally perfect and omniscient being would wish them to be. In Judeo-Christian terms, our world is a "fallen" world. The question remains whether the existence of evil is evidence against the existence of God.

Those who follow the strategy of seeking some set of non-necessary or logically contingent truths that, together with (E) There is evil, entail not-(G) God does not exist tend to appeal to claims about our knowledge and what is reasonable to accept in its light. The following argument provides a simple illustration. Let an evil whose purpose, if any, is unknown to us be an apparently pointless evil.

A simple argument

- 1 There are apparently pointless evils.
- 2 The Apparently Pointless Evil Claim: If there are apparently pointless evils, then God does not exist.⁹
- 3 God does not exist (from 1, 2).

The first premise is patently true. The conclusion follows from the premises. So the question is whether the second premise – The Apparently Pointless Evil Claim – is true. The idea behind this claim apparently is this:

- 2a The Actually Pointless Evil Claim: God would not allow actually pointless evils.
- 2b The We Would Know Claim: If an evil has a point, it will be apparent to us.

Then it follows that

- 2c God would not allow any evils that are apparently pointless.

And from 2c and 1 we can infer 3 – the claim that God does not exist. Suppose, then, that the truth of 2a and 2b is intended as the necessary and sufficient conditions of the truth of The Apparently Pointless Evil Claim.

Suppose that 2a and 2b provide both background assumptions and presuppositions of that claim. Then if either 2a or 2b is false, 2 will be false. If we have no reason to think 2a (The Actually Pointless Evil Claim) is true, or no reason to think 2b (The We Would Know Claim) true, then we will have no reason to think The Apparently Pointless Evil Claim true.

In our discussion of these matters, we will focus almost entirely on The We Would Know Claim. The question as to whether God would allow actually pointless evils is very difficult to answer, and we will not argue either for or against it. The critic obviously needs it for his argument to succeed. We will suspend judgment here regarding its truth, and discuss its meaning only to the degree that this is helpful in getting clear about The We Would Know Claim.¹⁰

Let us begin, then, with The We Would Know Claim. Would we know it if an evil has a point? The purposes of an omniscient being might well be beyond our comprehension.¹¹ Hence there is no reason whatever to think that if God allows an evil E in the light of E's having a certain point P, we will know what P is. So there is no reason whatever to think The We Would Know Claim is true. Hence there is no reason whatever to suppose that The Apparently Pointless Evil Claim is true. Since we have no reason to accept The We Would Know Claim, we have no reason to think that The Apparently Pointless Evil Claim is true. Hence the Simple Argument fails. There is, however, a more sophisticated argument right next door.

A more sophisticated argument

It is true that, for lots of evils, we have no idea what their point, if any, actually is. What point does someone's having a migraine, a stomach ulcer, cancer, or the inability to speak have? Even if we are able to say in general what might serve as a rationale for a morally perfect omniscient being allowing evils, and even for allowing certain specific kinds of evils, we are not in a position to say things that would result from filling in sentences like this with the names of actual persons and actual evils: The reason why person X experienced evil Y is that the point of evil Y is Z. Doing so would presuppose a degree of knowledge we do not have. There are also evils regarding which it is hard to say what their point might be.

Suppose, then, we divide evils into two broad and admittedly ill-defined¹² classes: those kinds of evils for which we can at least imagine some point, and those for which we cannot. Call these very loosely defined classes of kind of evil, respectively, imaginably pointful and unimaginably pointful. Perhaps suffering that turns a miserably selfish person into a person of compassion falls into the former class; perhaps so does even a miserably selfish person being allowed to suffer as a way of providing her an opportunity to become compassionate. Perhaps an accident that renders irrevocably comatose a loving wife and mother whose community activities alleviated much suffering falls into the class of unimaginably painful evils.¹³

The class of imaginably painful evils can be further divided into those where nothing we know about a particular case renders it unavailable for being painful in the imagined way, and cases where this is ruled out by what we know. Suppose two stingy hoarders face death by freezing and are discovered just in time to save their lives. The one becomes generous and charitable, but the other has been so completely conditioned to be mean about money that even his being rescued by Red Cross workers does not make him any more willing to be charitable. One might think of the suffering the first hoarder endured as having a point in its positive results on his character, but the latter hoarder was so set in his ways that changing was not an option, even if he nearly froze to death. Let the former sort of case be imaginably and contextually painful and the latter sort of case be imaginably, but not contextually, painful. A rough informal characterization of the sense of these terms is this: an imaginably and contextually painful evil is one that, so far as we know, may occur to a person under conditions in which the evil serves some morally sufficient point – some point such that a perfectly good being who allowed the evil to occur in order that the point be served acted rightly in so doing.¹⁴ An imaginably, but not contextually, painful evil is one that might occur to a person under conditions in which the evil serves some morally sufficient point – some point such that a perfectly good being who allowed the evil to occur in order that the point be served acted rightly in so doing – but we know something about the circumstances in which the evil occurred that fully prevents them from being conditions of this sort. An evil is unimaginably painful if after considerable effort we still cannot think of any condition under which the occurrence of that sort of evil might serve some morally sufficient point – some point such that a perfectly good being who allowed the evil to occur in order that the point be served acted rightly in so doing.¹⁵

A more formal characterization of these rough distinctions can be expressed along these lines:

- D1 An evil E is imaginably and contextually painful relative to person S if and only if (i) we can describe a condition C such that if S is in C and endures E, it is possible that her doing so will be a necessary condition of S coming to have property Q, where S's having Q is a sufficiently good state of affairs that one who allowed S to endure E for the sake of S coming to have Q would be morally justified in so doing, and (ii) nothing we know about S is incompatible with S's actually being in C when S endured E.¹⁶

- D2 An evil E is imaginably but not contextually pointful relative to person S if and only if (i) we can describe a condition C such that if S is in C and endures E, it is possible that her doing so will be a necessary condition of S coming to have property Q, where S's having Q is a sufficiently good state of affairs that one who allowed S to endure E for the sake of S coming to have Q would be morally justified in so doing, and (ii) something we know about S is incompatible with S's actually being in C when S endured E.

By contrast:

- D3 An evil E is unimaginably pointful relative to person S if and only if we cannot describe a condition C such that if S is in C and endures E, it is possible that her doing so will be a necessary condition of S coming to have property Q, where S's having Q is a sufficiently good state of affairs that one who allowed S to endure E for the sake of S coming to have Q would be morally justified in so doing.

Imaginably and contextually pointful evils are the least plausible candidates for use in an attempt to derive not-(G) God does not exist from (E) There is evil. Thus we will consider arguments that deal with the notions of the other sorts of evils. One might begin, then, with these reflections and offer either of the following arguments.

The "imaginably but not contextually pointful" argument

- 1* There are imaginably but not contextually pointful evils.
- 2* If there are imaginably but not contextually pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils.¹⁷
- 3* There are actually pointless evils (from 2*, 3*).
- 4* If there are actually pointless evils, then God does not exist.
- 5* God does not exist (from 3*, 4*).

The key premises in this argument are (2*) and (4*); we will first consider (2*). It is a restricted version of The We Would Know Claim. Even if, as we argued above, the unrestricted version is false, this restricted version might be true. Since it approves the inference from There are imaginably but not contextually pointful evils to There are pointless evils, what it says is tantamount to Evils that are not contextually pointful are actually pointless. Is that true?

The other, similar argument is the "unimaginably pointful" argument.

The “unimaginably painful” argument

- 1 There are unimaginably painful evils.
- 2 If there are unimaginably painful evils then there are actually pointless evils.¹⁸
- 3* There are actually pointless evils. (from 1, 2)
- 4* If there are actually pointless evils, then God does not exist.
- 5* God does not exist (from 3*, 4*).

The key premises of this argument are (2) and (4); we will first consider (2). It is a differently restricted version of The We Would Know Claim. Even if, as we argued above, the unrestricted version is false, this restricted version might be true. Since it approves the inference from There are unimaginably painful evils to There are pointless evils, what it says is tantamount to Evils that are unimaginably painful are actually pointless. Is that true?

Concerning premise 2* of the “imaginably but not contextually painful” argument: evils that are not contextually painful are actually pointless

Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that premise 1* is true. This helps the critic only if premise 2* is also true. Granting premise 1* grants this: there are evils that may have some point, but no point we can think of that they might have is compatible with what seems true about the circumstances in which they occur. What premise 2* says is that if there are evils that may have some point, but no point we can think of that they might have is compatible with what seems true about the circumstances in which they occur, then there is no point that they do serve.

Suppose a man wears a paper bag on his head. While either the man has a mustache, or he does not, so long as the bag is over his head it is neither apparent that he does nor apparent that he does not. We just can’t see. Similarly, while either an evil has a point or it does not, it is possible that we cannot tell which is the case.¹⁹ Competitive to premise 2*, then, is:

- 2a* If there are imaginably but not contextually painful evils then there are evils regarding which we should suspend judgment as to whether or not they actually have a point.²⁰

Where premise 2* counsels a specific conclusion (there are pointless evils), its competitor 2a* commends suspense of judgment regarding that conclusion. Not surprisingly, the same issue comes up again regarding the unimaginably painful argument.

Concerning premise 2 of the “unimaginably painful” argument: evils that are unimaginably painful are actually pointless

Consider this argument:

2 If there are unimaginably painful evils then there are actually pointless evils.

What this premise tells us is that if we cannot even imagine what point an evil of a certain kind might have, then it has no point. Competitive to 2

2a If there are unimaginably painful evils then there are evils regarding which we should suspend judgment as to whether or not they actually have a point.

Whereas 2 counsels a specific conclusion (there are pointless evils), its competitor 2a* commends suspense of judgment regarding that conclusion.

An essential element in one influential attempt to move from (E) There is evil to not-(G) God does not exist is premise 2* (as against 2a*), premise 2 (as against 2a), or some closely analogous claim. Is it 2* or 2, rather than 2a* or 2a, that are true? Perhaps the best way to decide is to consider the sort of case that makes premises like 2* and 2 plausible if anything does.

Animal suffering

Consider premises 2* If there are imaginably but not contextually painful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are not contextually painful are actually pointless) and 2 If there are unimaginably painful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are unimaginably painful are actually pointless) as applied to an example made famous by William Rowe.²¹ Imagine a doe trapped in a forest fire and burned to death. On traditional views, the doe has no after-life in which her suffering can somehow serve her. She has no capacity for moral character in which she could gain even momentary fortitude. Imagine also that no one knows or ever learns of her fate, so that no good comes to others from reflecting on her suffering. The point is that even if afterlife, moral character, or the sober reflections of others would obviously render her suffering less problematic, they do not apply here. In the case of non-human animals, exercise of responsible free will, the development of virtues, and future consequences for the sufferer, at least on traditional notions concerning the nature and status of such beings, do not arise. They do not arise even if the idea that the suffering of animals serves some human good is not itself morally problematic.

Strictly speaking, it seems false that animal suffering is an evil for we can conceive no possible point. Suppose that all animal suffering that occurred before human beings existed was caused by unembodied moral agents who exercised their freedom in ways that involved making innocent creatures suffer. They thereby went from being angels to being demons. Suppose further that there being moral agents whose exercises of freedom determine their moral character is itself, independent of how that character turns out, a highly good thing. Then even if some unembodied moral agents²² cause animal suffering, it is not wrong that they have been allowed to do so. This seems a conceivable point for animal suffering. Given some ingenuity, it seems that we can find some conceivable point for any evil we have any good reason to think has occurred.

It does not follow that there is no evil whatever that God could not wrongly permit. Suppose God were to create seven persons who existed only for twelve years. At each moment they suffered as much agony as they were capable of experiencing while feeling a deep hatred of God and one another that inevitably arises from features built into them at creation. Then God annihilates each of them for ever. Suppose, finally, that these are the only things that God ever creates. Within the constraints of these assumptions, it seems that the evils these persons suffer can have no point.²³

Rowe very plausibly believes that the sort of case he describes – commonly called “the Bambi case” – including various species of animals, have actually occurred in a time-span overlapping that of the human race. Further, most animal suffering occurred before there were any human beings. Consider propositions:

(K1) Knowledge that there has been massive animal suffering, most of it occurring in particular cases not known by any human being, serves to cause in human beings a moral or religious state not otherwise obtainable save at comparable cost,

and

(K2) That state is sufficiently valuable to justify the suffering requisite to it.

While (K1) and (K2) are not in any obvious manner self-contradictory, it is hard to see what the alleged moral or religious state might be, and there seems no reason whatever to think them true. This much of Rowe's case seems impeccable.

Animal suffering is a highly plausible candidate for an evil that is either imaginably but not contextually pointful or unimaginably pointful. Is it true regarding animal suffering that if it is imaginably but not contextually pointful, or unimaginably pointful, then animal suffering is actually pointless? The Rowean critic takes the answer to be affirmative. The monotheist is likely to disagree. Who is right?

The proper answer to the "Who is right?" question rests on the sort of connection it is reasonable to think holds between an evil E being imaginably but not contextually pointful or else unimaginably pointful and E being actually pointless. Are our relevant cognitive powers reliable enough, and our relevant knowledge great enough, for us to say that an evil's having the first of these properties is good evidence that it also has the second of these properties? The Rowean argument in favor of thinking that our cognitive powers are reliable, and our information sufficient, goes as follows.

We often have to make judgments in cases in which we would like more information. Nonetheless, our only choice is to follow the best reasoning we can find and accept the results. If it is true that:

- 1 For all we can tell, it is true that P;
- 2 We can find no evidence in favor of not-P, it is proper to infer to

- 3 It is reasonable to believe that P, and unreasonable not to do so.

In accord with Professor Rowe's intention, we might call reasoning of the sort that 1–3 represents Common Reasoning. The relevant application of this reasoning is:

- 4 For all we can tell, it is true that animal suffering has no point.
- 5 We can find no evidence in favor of animal suffering having a point.²⁴

So it is proper to infer to:

- 6 It is reasonable to believe that animal suffering has no point, and unreasonable not to do so.

Granted, either an evil has a point or it does not. Whether it does or not is independent of whether we think it does or not. There is no proposal that evil E's having a point and our being aware of E's point are related by entailment, natural law, or the like. But, the Rowean claims, the reasoning in 4–6 exemplifies the pattern exhibited by 1–3, and this pattern of reasoning is rightly of high repute and common use. Not to apply it to whether animal suffering has a point is tantamount to rejecting reasoning all of us apply all of the time. Such a strategy smacks of inconsistency, dishonesty, and special pleading, none of which is the way of true philosophy. So:

(2*) If there are imaginably but not contextually pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are not contextually pointful are actually pointless)

and

(2) If there are unimaginably pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are unimaginably pointful are actually pointless)

triumph.

For all its apparent force, this argument fails. The question as to whether animal suffering has a point is the question as to whether God, if God exists, might have a morally sufficient reason for allowing it. Suppose the reasoning exhibited in 1–3²⁵ fits perfectly any such case as this:

- 4a For all we can tell, it is true that Bill's allowing his animals to suffer has no point.
- 5a We can find no evidence in favor of the view that Bill's allowing his animals to suffer has a point.²⁶

So it is proper to infer to:

- 6a It is reasonable to believe that Bill's allowing his animals to suffer has no point, and unreasonable not to do so.

We can also argue:

- 4aa For all we can tell, Bill's animals are suffering.
- 5aa We can find no evidence that Bill's animals are not suffering.

So it is proper to infer to:

6aa It is reasonable to believe that Bill's animals are suffering, and unreasonable not to do so.

Such cases do not give reason for us to raise our intellectual eyebrows or think that the reasoner has exceeded proper limits. But it is not so clear that things continue to go well if we reason:

- 4* For all we can tell, God (if God exists) has no morally sufficient reason for allowing animal suffering.
- 5* We can find no evidence in favor of the view that God (if God exists) has a morally sufficient reason for allowing animal suffering.²⁷

So it is proper to infer to 6* It is reasonable to believe that God (if God exists) has no morally sufficient reason for allowing animal suffering, and unreasonable not to do so.

Our ability to discern the truth about the situation concerning Bill intentions, motives, and consequences, and the truth about Bill's animals' suffering, presumably is quite reliable. The same is not so clear regarding the situation concerning God (if God exists) allowing animal suffering. To the degree that this is so:

(2*) If there are imaginably but not contextually pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are not contextually pointful are actually pointless)

and

(2) If there are unimaginably pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are unimaginably pointful are actually pointless)

are in trouble.

Salient to God's situation regarding allowing animal suffering is this. Rowe's argument requires that it be true that Necessarily, if God exists then there is no pointless evil. Given that claim, any evidence we have for God's existence is evidence against there being pointless evil. (It need not be evidence against there simply being evil.) But no evidence regarding Bill's existence is automatically evidence against there being pointless evil. Further, Bill's capacities are like our own. His reasons for action, the range of his knowledge, the scope of his power are like ours. If after careful reflection we cannot see any good reason Bill might have for allowing his animals to suffer, this is some reason to think that he has no such reason. It is, at least, insofar as it is true that if Bill had some such reason, it would occur to us. Nonetheless, even with other human persons, observing their behavior and its consequences is often far easier than discerning their motives and intentions. Identifying any cases of divine behavior and its consequences is more difficult than doing the analogous thing regarding human behavior and its consequences. Drawing conclusions about any divine motives and intentions there may be is exquisitely difficult. This is very relevant to (2*) and (2). It is important to take into full account in considering the principle of Common Reasoning.

Consider, then, these principles of reasoning:

- (R) (For Roweanism) If a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with natural objects, artifacts, the means and ends of human persons, or the means and ends of a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed ours, then the results of applying it is reasonably believed to be reliable.
- (R*) If a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with natural objects, artifacts, or other human persons, then applying it is reasonably believed to be reliable; if a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed ours, it is reasonable to think that such reasoning is as likely to be unreliable as it is to be reliable.

The basic idea on which Rowe's position rests is that (R) is true, and that this gives a favorable presumption to:

- (2*) If there are imaginably but not contextually pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are not contextually pointful are actually pointless)

and

- (2) If there are unimaginably pointful evils then there are actually pointless evils (= Evils that are unimaginably pointful are actually pointless).

A Rowean needs (R); it is hard to see that (R) is correct as opposed to (R*). Let us look at matters a bit more fully. In doing so, we will need to consider The Actually Pointless Evil Claim that says:

2a God would not allow actually pointless evils.

Our concern, as noted above, will be with its meaning, not its truth – which the critic's argument requires and about which we here suspend judgment.

Actually (or metaphysically) pointless evils

We have talked about evils being imaginably or unimaginably pointless, and the like. These are epistemological features of evils, properties that they have in relation to us. They are relational properties that an evil may or may not have, but has if at all due to certain human cognitive states. Being actually (or metaphysically) pointless, like having a point, are properties an evil has, if at all, whether we know it has it or not.²⁸ But what, exactly, is a pointless evil? In considering this question, it seems best to start with what it might be for an evil to have a (metaphysical) point. Then we can, so to say, proceed by subtraction in defining an evil being without point. Here is one definition:

Definition 1: Evil E has an actual (or metaphysical) point if and only if there is some good G such that (i) E's obtaining is a logically necessary condition of G's obtaining,²⁹ and (ii) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted in order to make G possible.

A pointless evil, on this account, is simply one for which there is no corresponding good of which both (i) and (ii) are true. Given this understanding of pointlessness, is true?

2a The Actually Pointless Evil Claim: God would not allow actually pointless evils

The idea is not that under some circumstances, or given some conditions, God would not allow actually pointless evils, and those circumstances or conditions obtain. The idea is that 2a is a logically necessary truth – that (P) *It is logically impossible that a morally perfect and omniscient being allow any pointless evils.*³⁰ It is this assumption that her argument requires that makes it crucial for the critic to show that there are pointless evils. If (P) is false, the monotheist can simply say: maybe there are pointless evils – so what?

It is worth emphasizing that there are not two kinds of point, actual (or metaphysical) and epistemological (having to do with imaginability); there are simply actual points on the one hand, and our views about actual points on the other.

It also deserves emphasis that appeal to:

(R*) If a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with natural objects, artifacts, or other human persons, then applying it is reasonably believed to be reliable; if a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed ours, it is reasonable to think that such reasoning is as likely to be unreliable as it is to be reliable.

over

(R) (For Roweanism) If a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with natural objects, artifacts, the means and ends of human persons, or the means and ends of a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed ours, then the results of applying it is reasonably believed to be reliable.

is not inconsistent with other claims we will make later. To prefer (R*) to (R) involves rejecting the principle of Common Reasoning as applied to God and evil. This is not inconsistent with offering arguments for the existence of God. It is not incompatible with claiming that religious experience is evidence for God's existence. It is easier to detect the existence of a human person, and to discover that she is self-conscious and possesses intelligence, than it is to discern her intentions, motives, and purposes. It is not inconsistent to hold that there is argument or evidence to the effect that God exists but that tracking God's reasons for allowing what God allows is often beyond us.

Chancey worlds

If (P) It is logically impossible that a morally perfect and omniscient being allow any pointless evils is true, it is a necessary truth. If (P) is a necessary truth then we cannot consistently describe any condition under which (P) is false. Here is an interesting attempt to offer such a description.³¹ Consider a world W of this sort:³² W is strongly random so that often the microevents in it constrain the macroevents that occur to a much less significant extent than presumably is the case in our world. For example, in W a car's being in a particular position at one moment may leave open where it will be a moment later in ways that far exceed considerations of what its driver may do or what would follow were there laws in that world like the laws that hold in our world. Call these events in which randomness is great randomness cases.³³ Suppose that in a randomness case, Sue crosses a street and is killed in an automobile accident which, given preceding conditions, might equally well never have happened. Chance plays a significant role in this world. The accident, strictly, has no cause if a cause is an event A such that, given A and all relevant laws, the accident's occurrence is more probable than not. In that very plausible sense of "cause," the accident was causeless, because it was as likely not to occur as to occur relative to what obtained independent of anyone's knowledge.

In a world where chance, or absence of cause, plays such an important role, it is false that such events as the accident are planned by anyone, human or divine. Indeed, this is true of all events that occur in randomness cases in this world. Even if God knows in advance that the accident would happen, God did not cause the accident (it had no cause). But if God did not cause the accident, then God did not plan the accident.

It is possible that God put constraints on this world so that, even by chance, no event can occur that God would be wrong in permitting. Suppose also that each person in W is under divine providence, so that while God permits Sue to be killed in the accident, God also preserves Sue in existence, reunites her with her family in the afterlife, and so on. In sum, one could complete the description of W in such a way that, even though there are evils in W for which God did not plan, nonetheless God brings good out of these evils for those who suffer them.

One thing that arises from such considerations is this: God presumably could know in advance what would happen even in a chancey world. An intrinsically omniscient God will not ever have to infer what will happen from something else God knows. So God would, even regarding chancey worlds, know what will occur and so create only a world in which there will randomly occur events that, if they are evils, have a point. In sum: God's allowing an evil E to occur because it has a point does not entail God caused or planned that E occur.

Suppose (differently and dubiously) that God would not know what would happen in a chancey world until it happened. Still, God could set limits on what could happen in such a world so that no event that might take place within those boundaries was one God could not bring sufficient good out of to make it not morally wrong that the evil be allowed. This suggests a second definition of having a point:

Definition 2: Evil E has an actual (or metaphysical) point if and only if there is some good G such that (i) God can bring good G out of E's occurrence, and (ii) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted, whether or not E is a logically necessary condition of G.

In one way it does not seem that the possibility of such a world as W changes much. In a chancey world, God is morally justified in allowing evils even though God did not cause them or plan them in any sense in which planning includes causing. It still may be that the evils in W are of a sort that the presence in W of evils of their sort has a point (in one or the other defined senses) though perhaps a point that might be served by other instances of their kind of evil or by instances of evils of some different kind. Let an evil be divinely unjustified if and only if God would be morally unjustified in allowing it to occur. It seems that the constraint that no divinely unjustified evils can be allowed applies to W as much as to any world God created. And it seems that the evils in W that are not planned are nonetheless permitted for morally sufficient reason, even if that reason is of a sort that could instead have applied to other specific evils, or to evils of some other kind, or been replaced by some other morally sufficient reason which would have applied had a different chance outcome arisen. What follows is that God can have a point in permitting an evil even if God did not plan the world in such a way that that evil occurred in it. It does not follow that God could allow an evil that was actually pointless. It does follow that even under conditions of randomness, where our ability to judge whether an evil has a point or not would be even less than whatever it is now, evils could have actual or metaphysical points. Not even the randomness of such a world would be forceful evidence of there being actually or metaphysically pointless evils – evils that were divinely unjustified.

Religious maturity

An important topic is relevant here about which the author claims no direct knowledge. In making it, it is assumed that a defensible monotheism cannot entail that any moral truth is not true, and that genuine religious values include rather than contradict moral values. Morality deals with what may not be done to, and what must be done for, people. What goes beyond this is supererogatory. Monotheistic theology is typically committed to the view that God is morally good. Thus God is conceived in such a manner as not to act against morality. But monotheism typically and very plausibly supposes that full moral maturity, however essential a part thereof, is not identical to full maturity as a person. Full maturity, it is held, goes beyond morality, partly by demanding what is morally supererogatory, partly by including features of character than are not purely and simply moral features. These matters are deep and complex, but a really nuanced discussion of the problem of evil cannot ignore them. Often ignored, they nonetheless fall within the range of what is relevant to the problem of evil.

Suppose that Susan can achieve a state of religious maturity – of relationship with and likeness to God, in such ways as are available to created persons – or to possess a degree of religious virtue or have a religious experience of an important sort, or the like, if Susan is allowed to experience a certain evil E. Call this state or disposition or experience that is of high religious value saintliness for lack of a better term. Suppose that evil E is not a logically necessary condition of anyone reaching saintliness. It is compatible with this that it is contingently true that Susan will not reach saintliness unless she does experience E. All of the ways by which one might reach this goal without enduring evil are ways Susan cannot take because of choices she might not have made, but has made, or might never make, but in fact would make. Finally, suppose that God allows Susan to undergo evil in order that she might reach saintliness. It seems logically possible that if Susan reaching saintliness is highly valuable, God's allowing her to find her way to it by means that include her suffering E is itself good, not evil. God's doing so would not be divinely unjustified.

We can now come to the point of this discussion. Consider its relevance to The Actually Pointless Evil Claim:

2a God would not allow actually pointless evils.

Add to it the definition:

Definition 1: Evil E has an actual (or metaphysical) point if and only if there is some good G such that (i) E's obtaining is a logically necessary condition of G's obtaining,³⁴ and (ii) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted in order to make G possible.

If one takes this to be the proper definition of has a point then only evils that are logically necessary conditions of goods can have a point. The scenario offered concerning religious maturity seems logically consistent. If so, then this definition of has a point is too narrow. We need instead the more complex:

Definition 3: Evil E has a point if and only if (a) there is some good G such that (i) E's obtaining is a logically necessary condition of G's obtaining, and (ii) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted in order to make G possible or (b) there is some good G such that (iii) God can bring good G out of E's occurrence, and (iv) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted, whether or not E is a logically necessary condition of G.

It would be helpful here, no doubt, to offer plausible, fleshed-out examples of what sort of state, virtue, or experience saintliness might amount to, or at least sketchily described description, perhaps in terms of a durable disposition toward self-giving love, a tranquil and charitable character expressed in improving people's lives, or a continuing sense of the presence of God. For a Jew, the suffering of the Jewish people no doubt is relevant here, and for a Christian the suffering of Christ. But conceptually and empirically, these are beyond this author. I simply note the relevance of such matters to a nuanced account of the problem of evil. I also note that the occurrence of the sort of saintliness roughly characterized here is of great importance to the monotheistic religious traditions. It is the sort of character that genuine faith, worship, and monotheistic religious experience is supposed to bring the believer to, if only in the long run.

One misplaced criticism should be noted. The discussion here does not assume, contrary to the critic's own beliefs, that there are such states or experiences in the offing, with God ready to supply them. The point is simply that when one is considering propositions that are, if true, then necessarily true – such as The Actually Pointless Evil Claim (that God would not allow pointless evil) – one is not only entitled but required to consider what the possibilities are. If there are possibilities that would not be possible if a proposition P were a necessary truth, then P is not a necessary truth (and if P is, if true, then a necessary truth, then P is, if false, necessarily false). If it appears that X is a possibility, and X is not a possibility if P is true, then the apparent possibility of X is evidence against P's truth. The argument here is that the logical possibility of the saintliness scenario is evidence against The Actually Pointless Evil Claim (that God would not allow pointless evil) if it limits having a point to Definition 1. What is required, if The Actually Pointless Evil Claim is to be true, is that it be construed along lines as least as broad as:

Definition 3: Evil E has a point if and only if (a) there is some good G such that (i) E's obtaining is a logically necessary condition of G's obtaining, and (ii) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted in order to make G possible or (b) there is some good G such that (iii) God can bring good G out of E's occurrence, and (iv) G's obtaining is of sufficient worth to justify E's being permitted, whether or not E is a logically necessary condition of G.

Common Reasoning, however reliable relative to the scope of natural objects, artifacts, the means and ends of human persons, it does not follow that it is reliable concerning the means and ends used by a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed our own.

One thing that makes deciding between:

(R) (For Roweanism) If a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with natural objects, artifacts, the means and ends of human persons, or the means and ends of a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed ours, then the result of applying it is reasonably believed to be reliable.

and

(R*) If a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with natural objects, artifacts, or other human persons, then applying it is reasonably believed to be reliable; if a case in which one wishes to apply reasoning of the sort 1–3 exhibits – Common Reasoning – is one dealing with a person whose cognitive capacities, moral goodness, and causal powers vastly exceed ours, it is reasonable to think that such reasoning is as likely to be unreliable as it is to be reliable.

is that reflection about a monotheistic conception of God is a going enterprise; it is not impossible to draw any justified conclusions in the philosophy of monotheistic religion. It is easy to take an all-or-nothing stance here: either we can come to a reasonable decision regarding the truth or falsity of every proposition of interest to philosophy of monotheistic religion, or we can come to a reasonable decision regarding none. But this stance is mistaken. It is false that, if God exists and each evil God allows has an actual point, we can reasonably expect to judge with confidence that we have discerned, for every type of evil, what that point is. That simply is not something we could reasonably expect. This being so, it is (R*), not (R), that is true. It is not cause for surprise if there are types of evil for which no one can suggest plausible candidates for the point, if any, they may serve. Nor is it evidence that they serve no point.

The Actually Pointless Evil Claim (that God would not allow pointless evil) and Definition 3

The relevance of Definition 3, and the discussion that led to it, can be simply stated. It is this: our ability to tell whether or not an actual evil has a point in the sense defined by Definition 3 is even more restricted than our ability to tell whether an evil has a point in the sense defined by the earlier definitions. It serves to increase awareness of the sorts of point an evil might serve, points not incompatible with, but also not limited to, morality. It thus renders Roweanism – acceptance of (R) as a correct characterization of reasonable confidence concerning Common Reasoning – less plausible by pointing out further sorts of points evils might have. Deciding whether an evil could have any point of this sort is even more demanding than whether it could serve any point that falls within the scope of morality.³⁵

Evil and moral acceptability

One might suggest this as a rough criterion for the moral acceptability of a person being allowed to suffer evil:

- C1 Kim's suffering evil E is morally acceptable if and only if Kim, relevantly informed about E, and insofar as rational, accepts E without moral protest.

For purposes of considering this notion, we can include under the notion of moral acceptability the occurrence of evils that serve to promote religious personal maturity in the rough sense characterized above. Kim's being relevantly informed regarding an evil is a matter of her knowing whatever is relevant to making a rational assessment of the moral justifiability of Kim suffering it – its effect on Kim, on others, what it makes available that would otherwise not be, and the like. The sort of ideal rationality required might be easier to achieve after an evil was undergone, even if undergoing it was not morally problematic. Perhaps C1 is true; even if it is, however, it is not easy to see how to apply it in any useful manner, since no one is likely to have much reason to think they are in the ideal situation C1 requires.

Succinct Roweanism

Roweanism, in one version at least, argues as follows. Let an evil E be Rowean if and only if (i) we have good reason to think it occurred; (ii) either we can think of no conceivable morally sufficient reason R that God might have for allowing it, or we can think of such an R but know³⁶ that the context in which the evil occurred rules out R applying, or we know that R would apply only if sorts of things exist that we know not to exist. Then the basic argument is:

- R1 There are Rowean evils.
- R2 If there are Rowean evils, then there are³⁷ actually pointless evils.

So

- R3 There are actually pointless evils.

Behind premise R2 lies some such principle of inference as:

- P1 If we can think of no conceivable morally sufficient reason R that God might have for allowing it, or we can think of such an R but know³⁸ that the context in which the evil occurred rules out R applying, or we know that R would apply only if sorts of things exist that we know not to exist, then we know that E is pointless.

Competitive to principle P1 is principle:

- P2 Even if either we can think of no conceivable morally sufficient reason R that God might have for allowing it, or we can think of such an R but know³⁹ that the context in which the evil occurred rules out R applying or we know that R would apply only if sorts of things exist that we know not to exist, it is reasonable to suspend judgment as to whether there are actually pointless evils.

A reply to succinct Roweanism

Here is a brief argument in reply:

- 1 Roweanism is correct only if it is more rational to accept P1 than it is to accept P2.
- 2 It is at least as rational to accept P2 as it is to accept P1.
- 3 If it is at least as rational to accept P2 as it is to accept P1 then it is not more rational to accept P1 than it is to accept P2.
- 4 It is not more rational to accept P1 than it is to accept P2 (from 2, 3).
- 5 Succinct Roweanism is not correct.

If this argument succeeds, succinct Roweanism fails. The crucial premise is 2; if it is true, then the rest of the argument is in order. Thus Roweanism requires that 2 be false. But there seems to be no good reason provided for thinking it false. So succinct Roweanism fails. (It is worth remarking here that the same rules apply in arguing against a claim as apply in arguing for it. The position offering the argument is supposed to provide the justifications.)

Evil and ecology

Most discussions of the problem of evil leave aside reference to such matters as the disappearance of species. This is understandable – environmental ethics is a complex and controversial field and any discussion of anything relevant to it is bound to make controversial claims. So it is safer to avoid such matters altogether unless one can devote an entire book to them. Perhaps unwisely, I will not follow this practice here. While various claims made may be even more controversial than philosophical claims usually are,⁴⁰ perhaps what follows may at least elicit some careful reflection about the alleged problem of ecological evil. (The use of “alleged” here is not intended to deny that there is ecological evil, but to be neutral at the outset as to whether the existence of such evil is evidence that God does not exist.)

Considering the problem of evil from a different angle may be helpful. There are at least two sorts of consideration that relate evil and ecology. One has to do with the suffering of non-human animals. The other is the disappearance of species. Connected with the second consideration is the fact that the history of the natural world is very far from presenting a picture of neatness and efficiency. These are two rather different sorts of issue, divisible along the lines of what we might call the disappearing species problem and the animal suffering problem.⁴¹ Either could arise without the other, and it seems fairly clear that a solution to the one need not be any solution at all regarding the other. In any case, the animal suffering issue has already been addressed. It is a particularly thorny issue for theodicy, but it does not follow that it is somehow equally difficult regarding the problem of evil, which is the concern here. The comments that follow focus on the matter of disappearing species and the connected matter of inefficiency.

Inefficiency

Inefficiency issues hardly arise concerning an omniscient being. It is false that:

(N) Necessarily, if a being B can achieve end E by means of causing process Q1 or by causing process Q2, where Q1 is simpler than Q2, then it is a defect in B if B elects to achieve E by causing Q2.*⁴²

Perhaps one can refine (N) by way of reference to scarcity of material, energy, time, or the like – but then an omniscient being won't be working under any variety of inherent scarcity. One might think of (N) as somehow defining, or following from, rationality, but artistic profusion is not inherently less rational than mathematical elegance. Presumably there is no rational need that the rhinoceros be among the inhabitants of our earth, but a rhinoceros is a fascinating creature. It is no less so if an efficiency expert would have removed him from the list of things to be produced. Whatever force remains to the inefficiency issue concerns the total disappearance of species.

It was argued above that our having no clear idea as to how to explain Bambi's suffering (or animal suffering in general) is no evidence whatever that such suffering is gratuitous. An exactly analogous argument holds regarding the disappearance of species, if that is an evil. There is no need to develop that argument here, since it is obvious how it would go. Other matters deserve fuller attention.

The disappearance of species

Let's say that some item X has purely extrinsic value if and only if X has worth for the sake of what it contributes to Y, and no other value whatever. Of course something may have both intrinsic and extrinsic worth; then it won't have purely extrinsic value. Let us say an item X has purely intrinsic value if and only if X has value and all of the value that X has lies entirely in X and not at all in anything that X contributes to anything else. (Aristotle's Unmoved Mover might be such a thing, or an enlightened Jain person in her isolated enlightened state.) God, minus creation, will have very high purely intrinsic value; once God creates, God keeps high intrinsic value but presumably also has extrinsic value – if God creates John, then God contributes a lot to John, having brought John into being and sustaining John and so on.⁴³

Value by association is a variety of extrinsic value. Suppose the President gives you a cactus. In charge of your cactus while you vacation, your friend Susan overwaters, and thereby kills, it. Even if Susan replaces it by a qualitatively identical cactus, the new cactus isn't the one the President gave you. It hasn't the same value to you, since it hasn't the same associations, and you find the associations significant.

One question is whether things below a certain level of complexity or capacity have any value or worth, or any beyond purely extrinsic value. Would there be any worth or value, say, in a world in which the most complex thing was a pile of sand and nothing had any capacities beyond those possessed by such a pile and its members? Value in this context is conceived in terms of natural value – the sort of thing that is expressed in the tradition that the existence itself of something X (that is, there being an X) has value. This question concerns whether not living members of species but non-living members of natural kinds have natural value.⁴⁴ It is not obvious that they do. Suppose that God executed a plan on which a universe of isolated electrons exists for, say, a trillion years and then goes poof. It is hard to see that this would be wrong of God to do. Nonetheless, since the objection being considered has more potential force if the pile-of-sand, or the isolated electrons, world has some natural value, assume for the sake of the argument that it does, and take the pile-of-sand world as a representative world of non-living things.

That this assumption is correct can be argued in at least two ways. Perhaps sand grains, electrons, and quantities of matter have purely extrinsic value, so the pile-of-sand world will have a purely extrinsic value sort of natural value. This argument fails, since there is nothing in the pile-of-sand world, considered as containing only extrinsic worth, to generate that worth. There is nothing of intrinsic value for the alleged extrinsic value to serve. The other is that such items have some intrinsic worth just by virtue of their existing at all. Then the idea is that even a pile-of-sand world has intrinsic value of some sort K. It still does not follow that it would be morally wrong that God obliterate something that has intrinsic worth of sort K. Even if it is true that something's existence has natural worth, it does not follow that causing or allowing it to cease to exist is wrong. Even if it would be wrong unless one had a morally sufficient reason for doing so, what follows is that doing so is something one should have a sufficient reason for doing. It may be that simply by virtue of having created a grain of sand or a mountain “from nothing” – that is, not out of pre-existing material – God has the right to do as God likes with the grain or the mountain.

In any case, it is living, or living-and-conscious, species that typically are the cause for greatest concern among those troubled by the disappearance of natural kinds; not, say, electrons but species of living things. Regarding living things that are not persons – plants and animals – there are again the two alternatives: that even plant and animal life has only pure extrinsic value or that it has intrinsic value of some sort K^* . The argument that we should not so act as to cause species to go out of existence because we may discover that some feature of some plant, insect, or animal may provide the cure for some dread disease, insofar as that is the whole argument, is based on a pure extrinsic value view of the plants, insects, and animals concerned. Those who claim it is an evil that plant and animal species are allowed to become extinct typically take this to be so because they take plants and animals to have pure intrinsic worth. Otherwise, as above, their ceasing to exist is not an evil unless persons who have pure intrinsic value also exist or cessation of plants and animals will prevent the existence of persons. Suppose, then, that plants and animals are held to have pure intrinsic worth.

That something has intrinsic natural worth does not by itself entail that it would be wrong to cause or allow it to cease to exist. Even if it would be wrong to allow it to cease to exist without sufficient reason for doing so, what follows is that in order to do so blamelessly one must have such a reason. The sheer fact of species disappearance – and of course an enormous number of species have gone extinct – seems by itself no evidence of anything gone morally awry.⁴⁵

It is clear that various species of living and of living-and-conscious, beings have become extinct. The ecological argument from evil goes:

- E1 There being non-extinct species of living, and/or living-and-conscious, beings has natural worth.
- E2 Species of such beings that were once not extinct now are extinct.
- E3 It is wrong to permit species of beings that have natural worth to become extinct unless one has sufficient moral justification for doing so.
- E4 If God exists then God has permitted species of beings that have natural worth to become extinct, and this was wrong unless God has sufficient moral justification for doing so⁴⁶ (from E1–E3).
- E5 There is no moral justification that God could have for permitting species that have natural worth to become extinct.⁴⁷
- E6 God does not exist (from E4, E5).

It is not clear that E4 is true. Nor is it clear that E5 is true. Suppose, simply for the sake of the argument, that E4 is true, and focus on E5. If God were to have the sort of reason E5 says God could not have, what might it be?

Dinosaurs were living and conscious. There now aren't any. Assume that their presence was a natural good. Is their absence an evil which God could have no good reason for allowing? Presumably the following is true:

(GN) For any number N of types of living and conscious things a world W contained, there is a possible world W^* such that W^* contains $N + 1$ types of living and conscious things.

Ecological or systemic considerations might make sheer addition impossible in certain worlds at certain points, but there is nothing in (GN) that requires that W^* be produced, so to say, from W by adding some new species. If (GN) is true, then for any number of non-extinct species containing living, or living-and-conscious, beings, there could be yet another. Hence whatever world God creates, God is "guilty" of not having produced as much natural value as there might be, and such "guilt" is vacuous.⁴⁸

One might claim that while it is true that God could also have created living-and-conscious things that God did not in fact create, still it is wrong that God in fact did create living-and-conscious things and then let them cease to exist. This claim has two versions, one concerning individuals and one concerning species, as follows:

- (P) For any item X , if X is a particular, actual living-and-conscious thing then it is wrong of God to allow X to cease to exist.
- (S) For any species X , if X is a species whose particular, actual members are living-and-conscious things, and there are particular members of X , then it is wrong of God to allow there to cease to be members of X .

The idea that individual members of animal species have intrinsic worth seems to enjoy little popularity among ecologists, whereas the idea that species have such worth enjoys high ratings. If there is any plausible reason, as opposed to sheer fashion and taste, behind preferring (S) to (P), presumably it is (or is closely related to) this: where X ranges over natural kinds of living-and-conscious things, that there being Xs is a good thing but it does not matter which Xs there are. The worth of a duck lies not in being the duck it is but in its being some duck or other. For any biological species Q , if there are no things that belong to Q , then there is no Q ; those who talk about species having vanished take exactly this view though they also talk about the value of the species, not the value of its members. They agree that when there are no more ducks (and no duck eggs or DNA) there is no duck species either. They seem typically to think that all the value lies, not in the particular deer that is now feeding on the salt lick that one put out last night, but in there being some deer or other, who cares which? Nonetheless, there cannot be intrinsic value in there being deer without there being intrinsic value in the deer that is now feeding on the salt lick. To put the relevant point positively, it is a necessary truth that:

- (C) For any class C, if C's having members has intrinsic worth, then for any item X that belongs to C, X has intrinsic worth.

But then the death of any given deer involves the loss of something that has intrinsic natural worth.⁴⁹ If there is something requiring moral justification in a species becoming extinct, there is also something requiring moral justification in the demise of one of that species' members.

Monotheism typically contends that creation was a matter of grace. God created things that might never have been, not only freely but also without obligation. It was (so to say) morally permissible for God not to have created at all, as well as morally permissible for God to have created as God did create, or to have created in lots of ways in which God did not create, but might have created. Monotheists also hold that, at least in the case of things not strictly created in God's image – in the case of things not persons – being X's creator entails being permitted to cease to sustain X in existence without needing moral justification. If this is so, the E1–E5 argument fails. It is then false that

- (E*) If X has intrinsic worth, and God permits X to cease to exist without having some morally sufficient justification for so doing, then God acts wrongly.

In sum: the critic who bases her case on alleged ecological evil needs (E*) or something like it, and strong arguments for (E*) are scarce at best.

Exchangeable intrinsic natural worth

Still, there remains the question as to what morally sufficient reason for allowing a species whose members possessed intrinsic natural worth to go extinct might amount to whether or not God would need such a reason. Suppose that:

- (C) For any class C, if C's having members has intrinsic worth, then for any item X that belongs to C, X has intrinsic worth.

or something much like it is true. Perhaps we should distinguish between exchangeable intrinsic worth and unexchangeable intrinsic worth. Having exchangeable intrinsic worth is a matter of having intrinsic worth but its not being wrong of an agent to eliminate it by causing there to be something else that also has intrinsic worth. If cacti have intrinsic worth, it is of the former sort. Extrinsic worth (including value by association) aside, if Jim drives over Ron's bush but apologizes and replaces it with another that is relevantly similar, then Ron owes Jim no more. If Jim does not care whether the bush is of the same sort, or whether the replacement item is a bush rather than a tree, if Jim apologizes and replaces the original bush by one of a different sort or by a tree, once again Ron owes Jim no more. But if Ruth is babysitting for Rita's child, loses her, and replaces her with another of the same age, gender, weight, IQ, and the like, it is false that it is only value by association that remains as a basis for Rita's agonizing protest. Those who accept (S) typically ascribe exchangeable intrinsic worth, not unexchangeable intrinsic worth, to dinosaurs and the members of other species. They need not deny (C) – the claim that For any class C, if C's having members has intrinsic worth, then for any item X that belongs to C, X has intrinsic worth; they need only to take the members of the relevant species to have exchangeable intrinsic worth. The monotheist can also grant that dinosaurs have exchangeable intrinsic worth.

Even if God would need a morally sufficient reason to allow a species whose members have exchangeable intrinsic natural worth to cease to exist – even if it is true, for example, that

- (D) God needs a morally sufficient reason for there once having been dinosaurs and there not now being any.

– it also seems plain that God has one if it is the case that God replaced dinosaurs by things of comparable exchangeable intrinsic worth (post-dinosaurean mammals). On the other hand, if (D) is false, it is hard to see why one should accept anything along the lines of:

- (D*) *God's goodness is called into question by there once having been N number of species and there now being N-minus-M number of species around now or ever again.*

It is worth noting that there is nothing in the notion of exchangeable intrinsic value that requires that the replacements be of the same kind, or in the same quantity, as what they replace.

Consider two sorts of exchange as follows:

- (EX) Y is permissibly interchangeable for X, where X has exchangeable intrinsic worth, only if Y is of the same species as X.
- (EY) Y is permissibly interchangeable for X, where X has exchangeable intrinsic worth, only if Y is of the same species as X, or if Y is of a different species than X, where there being things of the species that Y belongs to is of at least as much intrinsic natural value as there being things of the species to which X belongs.

The idea, of course, is that (EX) allows only within-species substitutions whereas (EY) allows between-species replacements. It seems plain that if anything in the neighborhood of (EX) and (EY) is true, it is (EY). If (EY) is true, then even if it would be wrong of God to create something of exchangeable intrinsic worth and then let it go out of existence without replacing it with something of equal worth, God could allow any number of species to go out of existence so long as there were appropriate replacements. And (EY) does not forbid that there be one replacement that belongs to one species that replaces the members of a number of other species so long as the one is valuable enough. The sort of replacement that is relevant here might be, for example, something of high intrinsic worth for things of lower, or something of unexchangeable intrinsic worth for things of only exchangeable intrinsic worth.⁵⁰

Two things should be noticed here. There is nothing in the notion of exchangeable intrinsic natural worth that requires, or that forbids, that if something X that has it, and is replaced by something Y, that X's having existed was somehow necessary for Y's coming to exist, whether Y has exchangeable intrinsic natural worth or unexchangeable intrinsic natural worth. Further, as noted earlier, for any world whose members have any degree of either exchangeable or unexchangeable intrinsic natural worth, God could create a world possessed of a higher degree.

Unexchangeable natural intrinsic worth

Traditional claims to the effect that something has unexchangeable intrinsic worth (though not using this language) have found the exchangeable intrinsic natural worth versus unexchangeable natural worth distinction to be based on the former lacking, and the latter having, moral worth. This claim, or one much like it, is at the basis of a respect for persons ethic. This distinction provides a clear and defensible answer to an otherwise baffling question: how can one rationally ground any such distinction?

The answer expresses a view sometimes called speciesism, which means “unjustifiably favoring one’s own species.” This is an evaluative term, and it is either accompanied by an argument defending the allegation of unjustifiability or it is a mere term of abuse. It may be true, as those who use the term sometimes say, that hippos would assign ultimate value to their own kind if they could. Those who hold a respect for persons ethic agree that were hippos capable of holding such positions, they would be persons – self-conscious minds embodied in hippo bodies – and as persons they would be correct in ascribing ultimate value to persons.

Consider the notion of baseline natural intrinsic worth where X has baseline intrinsic worth if and only if the proposition It is wrong to use X for the sake of something else in a way that reduces X’s intrinsic worth, and wrong to destroy X. The notion of baseline natural intrinsic worth is the notion of unexchangeable natural intrinsic worth writ in a different script. Monotheists frequently, perhaps typically,⁵¹ have taken being a person to include having unexchangeable intrinsic natural worth, or baseline natural intrinsic worth. (This is one reason why the typical monotheistic doctrine that persons survive the death of their bodies is not an arbitrary addition to monotheism.) Were God, then, to obliterate one person and fiat another, simply for the sake of changing the population content, this would be wrong. One standard basis for this view is that persons are agents, possessing rationality, freedom, responsibility, and the capacity to love God and others. Having baseline intrinsic natural worth, on this account, is inherently associated with having moral worth – with being capable of moral agency.⁵²

The monotheist, then, can hold that while God has allowed a great many sorts of things that possessed exchangeable intrinsic natural worth to come and go, God has also supplemented or replaced them with a species whose members have unexchangeable intrinsic natural worth.⁵³ So if God must have a morally sufficient reason for allowing things with exchangeable intrinsic natural worth to cease to exist, both in the sense of individuals dying and of species becoming extinct, it is possible that God has such reason. Thus E5 There is no moral justification that God could have for permitting species that have natural worth to become extinct, an essential premise in the critic’s argument, is false. Hence, even if we, as it were, make a present to the critic of premise E4 If God exists then God has permitted species of beings that have natural worth to become extinct, and this was wrong unless God has sufficient moral justification for doing so, another essential premise in that argument, the argument fails; and of course E4 is itself hardly an evident truth.⁵⁴

Conclusion

Of course there are other attempts – some made, some waiting discovery – to move from (E) There is evil through some set of further premises to not-(G) God does not exist. The enterprise of constructing such arguments is endless. The arguments so constructed infer from the existence of evil to the non-existence of God either claim that (a) (E) and (G) are logically incompatible or (b) seek some set S of discernible truths which, together with (E), is incompatible with (G) – or, if you prefer, a set S of discernible truths that, together with (E), entail the denial of (G). It turns out that (a) is false, and none of the versions of (b) considered above are successful. These attempts are typical ones – a fair sampling of such efforts. It is, then, dubious that the existence of evil is in fact evidence against the existence of God.⁵⁵ If there is a genuine problem of evil only if there is some such argument, it is dubious that there is any genuine problem of evil.

Epilogue

Another angle on Rowean arguments

We have called any evil that God could have no point in allowing a divinely unjustifiable evil. A follower of Rowe's argument need not suppose that there are actual evils that are divinely unjustifiable. She need only claim something weaker. Suppose an evil that we have good reason to suppose real has this feature: we can conceive of no point that this evil might serve which does not involve our positing the existence of things we have no reason to think exist. Call such evils inexplicable evils. An evil whose only conceivable purpose was to make trolls better people would be, in the relevant sense, inexplicable. Then the idea behind a Rowean argument will be:

- 1 An evil that is inexplicable is actually pointless.
- 2 God would not allow actually pointless evils.
- 3 There are inexplicable evils.
- 4 There are actually pointless evils (from 1 and 3).
- 5 God does not exist (from 2 and 4).

The justification of 1 is that an inexplicable evil – one for which we cannot think of any possible point without positing things which we have no reason to suppose exist – is an evil we may justifiably claim has no point. Roweanism presumably reasons as follows: on the evidence we actually have, an inexplicable evil has no discernible point. Maybe nonetheless it has a point; maybe, too, there are no pigs and Rhode Island is a desert. But on the evidence we possess, there are pigs, Rhode Island is not a desert, and there are pointless evils. It is reasonable to believe what is properly inferred from or based on our best evidence. So we are justified in accepting premise 1^{}. Since 3^{} is obviously true, and 1^{} and 3^{} entail 4^{}, we are justified in accepting 4^{}. So, if we are also justified in accepting 2^{}, we are justified in concluding that there is no God. If Necessarily, God allows no actually pointless evils is true, then – the Rowean claims – the newest Rowean argument wins the day. Thus reads the present version of Roweanism.

Here, then, the critic appeals to some such consideration as this:

(E^{*}) If upon careful reflection an evil is inexplicable, the reasonable conclusion is that it has no actual point.

If (E^{}) or its near kin is true, then the argument succeeds provided its second premise is also true. The question regarding (E^{}) is why we should prefer it as opposed to:

(E^{}) Even if upon careful reflection an evil is inexplicable, it is reasonable to suspend judgment as to whether it has no actual point, since we are not possessed of sufficient information and cognitive power to be able reasonably to claim that were an evil to have a point, then that evil would not be inexplicable to us.

Deciding whether an inexplicable evil is actually pointless is not something we must do for practical reasons – not something we must take a position on in the interests of world peace or better economic conditions or the like. So while sometimes we must make a judgment concerning some very tricky moral issue since no decision is worse than being wrong, a decision between (E^{}) and (E^{}) is not one of these cases. Nor will the attractiveness of (E^{}) as a rule for when we must decide give it any force for cases when we do not.

Unless one has good reason to accept (E^{}) over (E^{}), a Rowean argument will not work. What can be said in favor of (E^{}) over (E^{}) has to do with the claim that it is (E^{}) that we follow in cases other than deciding whether inexplicable evils are actually pointless, and we are inconsistent if we do not follow (E^{}) here. But it is utterly unclear that we do follow (E^{*}) in relevantly similar cases or even whether there are any relevantly similar cases. The idea that we are inconsistent if we do not use (E^{*}) in a Rowean manner requires some such claim as this:

(EE) If we follow (E*) in cases where we are not inferring from an evil being inexplicable to our being justified in claiming that it actually has no point, we should follow (E*) in that case as well.

The critic is assuming this: (N) Necessarily, if God has a morally sufficient reason for allowing E, then E has an actual point, because the critic infers from Some evil has no actual point to God does not exist via the claims that If an evil exists which God would have no morally sufficient reason for allowing, then (since God would allow no evil without having a morally sufficient reason) God does not exist. Thus, on the critic's view, (EE) is identical to:

(EE*) If we follow (E*) in cases where we are not inferring from an evil being inexplicable to our being justified in claiming that God has no morally sufficient reason for allowing it, we should follow (E*) in that case as well.

Whether something like (EE) or (EE*) is true depends on whether there is some relevant difference between cases in which it is reasonable⁵⁶ to follow them and the case in which we infer from an evil's inexplicability to (our being justified in) thinking it has no point. In applying (EE) or (EE*), we are taking ourselves to be in a position to infer that an omniscient being has no morally sufficient reason to allow an evil from the fact that we cannot think of what such a reason might be. It hardly seems unreasonable at least to suspend judgment about the applicability of (EE) or (EE*) to this sort of case, however wedded we are to its applicability in cases involving no such considerations. There seems, then, no reason to think it rationally inappropriate at least to suspend judgment regarding the applicability of (EE) and (EE*) to the sort of cases that a Rowean argument requires us to apply it. If this is so, we've no reason as yet to accept the conclusion of that argument.

A slightly different Rowean attempt goes like this. Consider this definition:

Evil E has a rationale if and only if God brings about, or permits, E to obtain in the light of some morally sufficient reason that God has for so doing.

Then we can form the Rowean argument:

Ra There are many evils whose rationale, if any, is unknown to us even after our most careful reflections.

- Rb If the rationale of an evil is unknown to us even after our most careful reflections, then it has no rationale.⁵⁷
- Rc There are many evils that have no rationale (from Ra, Rb).
- Rd If God exists, then all evils have a rationale.
- Re God does not exist (from Rc, Rd).

And while Ra is very plausible, Rb relies again on its being Principle P1 rather than Principle P2 that is the proper principle to apply to propositions like Ra.

Questions for reflection

- 1 Are God exists and There is evil logically incompatible propositions? How is the Consistency Strategy related to this question?
- 2 Does it solve whatever evidential problem the existence of evil may pose for monotheism if the monotheist says that God is very powerful but not omnipotent, knows a lot but is not omniscient, or is very good but not morally perfect?
- 3 Discuss the notion of a best possible world. What is contained in this notion? Is it logically possible that there be such a world?
- 4 Can even an omnipotent God create persons who are free and morally responsible for their actions but guaranteed always to act rightly?
- 5 What is it for an evil to have a point? Can a morally perfect God allow an evil that has no point?
- 6 Does Rowe's "Bambi argument" prove its point?
- 7 Discuss this argument: real evil exists only if persons have intrinsic worth; that persons have intrinsic worth is more plausible if monotheism is true than if any alternative is true; hence it is more plausible that there is real evil if monotheism is true than if any alternative is true; if it is more plausible that there is real evil if monotheism is true than if any alternative is true, then there being real evil is not an objection to monotheism; hence there being real evil is not an objection to monotheism. Is this argument, or some close cousin, sound and valid?

Annotated reading

Griffiths, Paul (1983) "Notes toward a critique of Buddhist karmic theory," Religious studies 18, 3 pp. 277–91. Argues that Buddhist karmic doctrine is incompatible with what we learn from contemporary physics.

Herman, Arthur (1976) The Problem of Evil in Indian Thought, Delhi: Motilal Barnasidas. A consideration of the idea that karmic theory allows one to solve the alleged problem of evil.

Leaman, Oliver (1995) Evil and Suffering in Jewish Philosophy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. A fine discussion of Jewish approaches to the alleged problem of evil.

Mackie, J. L. (1982) The Miracle of Theism, Oxford: Clarendon Press. A clear general critique of monotheism; the "miracle" is that anyone is a theist.

Ormsby, Eric (1984) Theodicy in Islamic Thought, Princeton: Princeton University Press. A fine discussion of Islamic approaches to the alleged problem of evil.

Pike, Nelson (ed.) (1964) God and Evil, Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall. A good collection of articles that helped frame contemporary discussions.

Plantinga, Alvin (1977) God, Freedom, and Evil, Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans; reprint of 1974 edition. A detailed clear discussion of the relevance of human freedom to the alleged problem of evil.

Reichenback, Bruce (1990) The Law of Karma, Honolulu, HI: University of Hawaii Press. An account and critique of the doctrine of karma.

Arguments for monotheism

Proof

Logical necessity

Purely conceptual proofs and the Ontological Argument

Empirical proofs, argument strategies, and principles of sufficient reason

Arguments by Thomas Aquinas

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Arguments for monotheism

Proof

Proof is a complex notion. In simplest terms, a proof is a valid argument with true premises. This is the standard notion of proof in logic. An argument consists of premises intended to provide support for a conclusion. An argument is valid if it is logically impossible that the premises be true and the conclusion be false.¹ Any argument of the form If A then B, A; therefore B, for example, will be valid.

Given this basic notion of a proof, the contemporary philosopher George Mavrodes has noted that one of the following arguments is a proof and the other is not:²

Argument A

1. Either God exists or nothing exists.
2. Something exists.
- So: 3. God exists.

Argument B

- 1*. Either God does not exist or nothing exists.
2. Something exists.
- So: 3*. God does not exist.³

Note that:

- (i) Premises 1 and 1* are disjunctions. They have the forms, respectively, Either G or N and Either not-G or N.
- (ii) It is false that nothing exists. So the N disjunct is false.
- (iii) Necessarily, either God exists or God does not exist; either G is true or else not-G is true.
- (iv) A disjunction is true so long as at least one of its members is true. So either 1 is true or else 1* is true.
- (v) Premise 2, which appears in both arguments, is true.
- (vi) Both arguments are valid.

- (vii) Argument A has the form: 1. Either G or N; 2. Not-N; so 3. G.
- (viii) Argument B has the form: 1*. Not-G or N; 2. Not-N; so 3*. Not-G.
- (ix) Thus either Argument A is valid and has only true premises or Argument B is valid and has only true premises.
- (x) Exactly one of these arguments is a proof in the sense of proof in logic: one of these argument not only is valid but also has only true premises.

Unless we know, independently of these arguments, whether God exists or not we cannot tell which argument is a proof. The simple notion of a proof in logic is perfectly proper for some purposes. But having a proof in that, and no stronger, sense for some conclusion C is of no help in deciding whether C is true. Mavrodes notes that we need a notion of a proof that extends our knowledge. Perhaps something along these lines will do.

Argument A is an argument that extends our knowledge relative to its conclusion C only if:

- (i) A is a proof in logic;
- (ii) we know that A is valid (that its premises entail its conclusion);
- (iii) we know that A is sound (that its premises are true);
- (iv) for each premise P of A, we can know whether or not P is true without having to know whether C is true (our knowledge of each of the argument's premises is independent of our knowing whether the argument's conclusion is true);
- (v) for the conjunct of all of the premises of A (premise one and premise two and premise three, etc.) we can know whether or not that conjunct is true without having to know whether C is true (our knowledge of all of the argument's premises together is independent of our knowing whether the argument's conclusion is true);
- (vi) for each premise P of A, our knowledge of P is better founded than our knowledge of C;
- (vii) for the conjunct of all of the premises of A (premise one and premise two and premise three, etc.), our knowledge of that conjunct is better founded than our knowledge of C.

This, or something much like it, is the sense of "proof" in which we seek proofs that religious beliefs are true. In what follows, we will consider some of the more interesting of the many attempts to provide such proofs.

Types of propositions

Something has truth value if and only if it is either true or false. Anything that has truth value is a proposition. Declarative sentences, typically used, express propositions; the same proposition can be expressed by various sentences in the same language or by various sentences in different languages. Thus “The man is old and asleep, and the woman is reading” and “The old man is asleep, and the woman is reading” are different sentences that typically express the same proposition. A proposition is either:

- 1 necessarily true (P is a necessary truth if and only if not-P is a contradiction – e.g., Nothing has logically incompatible properties is a necessary truth.)
- 2 necessarily false (P is necessarily false if and only if P is a contradiction – e.g., Bill Russell is exactly 6’9? tall, and is not exactly 6’9? tall is a necessary truth.)⁴
- 3 logically contingent (P is logically contingent if and only if it is neither necessarily true nor necessarily false; a logically contingent proposition may be true or it may be false – e.g., Bill Russell is exactly 6’9? tall is a logically contingent proposition.)

Further:

- 4 A proposition P is possibly true if and only if P is not a necessary falsehood – every necessary truth, and every logically contingent proposition, is possibly true.

Logical necessity

There are different views about logical necessity, and different meaning assigned to the words “logically necessary proposition.” A brief explanation is in order as to how logical necessity is understood here.⁵

Logical necessity is a feature of propositions, not sentences. It is not an artifact of our language or thought. Coming to see that a proposition is necessarily true is a discovery, not an invention or a discovery about our inventions. The reason for this is that necessary truths are not possibly false. Anything whose truth depends on our language or our conventions is possibly false, for our language and our conventions might never have existed at all. So neither the necessity nor the truth of necessary truths depends on our language or our conventions. Such truths are true under all conditions, and hence true in all possible worlds and across all possible cultures.

The prime example of a necessary truth in the history of philosophy is the principle of non-contradiction, which, as Aristotle said, is a principle both of thought and of things. It can be expressed as Necessarily, no proposition is both true and false or as Necessarily, no thing can have logically incompatible properties. These ways of putting the principle are mutually entailing. If something could have incompatible properties, then propositions could be both true and false. If propositions could be both true and false, then the proposition that a thing had incompatible properties could be true and so a thing could have incompatible properties.

Many contemporary philosophers, using the language of some medieval philosophers, distinguish between necessity de dicto and necessity de re – necessity in speech and necessity in things. Suppose that Tony is a local barber and consider two sentences about him:

- A Necessarily, Tony is a person.
- B Tony is necessarily a person.

These sentences express different propositions. What A says is this:

- A1 Tony is a person, and it is logically impossible that Tony not be a person.

This entails:

- A2 Necessarily, Tony exists.

Of course A2 is false; however much he and his skills might be missed, Tony does not enjoy logically necessary existence. There are possible conditions in which, or possible worlds in which, Tony would not exist. No doubt for a very long time our own world was Tonyless.

What B says is:

- B1 Tony is a person, and anything that is a person is a person so long as it exists at all; being a person entails being a person necessarily because being a person (unlike being a Democrat or having false teeth) is an essential property of anything that has it.

To embrace the idea that there are necessities de re one must think that there are essential properties or essences. B1, and hence B, is true if this idea is true; if there are essential properties or essences, being a person is among them.

Unfortunately (something its users do not intend) the language that contrasts de dicto (of speech) and de re necessity can easily suggest that there is one thing – say, logical necessity – and another thing – say, metaphysical necessity – and that the former is relative to language and the latter, if it exists at all, is a human-mind-independent thing. In fact, those philosophers who favor the view that there are both necessities de dicto and necessities de re view things very differently. To speak of the necessity of a dictum is to speak of the necessity not of an asserted declarative sentence but of what is asserted by that sentence – of a proposition. Necessarily true propositions, on their view, are human-mind-independently necessary and human-mind-independently true. They no more depend for their necessity or their truth on us than do necessities de re. There are necessities de re only if there are essences.

One can summarily put the point like this: there are necessarily true propositions, and if there are essences, some of those necessarily true propositions will be necessarily true about essences, including some conditional necessary truths about things that have those essences to the effect that they necessarily have them if they have them at all. For example, it is true of Tony that:

B Tony is necessarily a person, and that:

A* If Tony is necessarily a person, then the proposition If Tony exists then Tony is a person is a necessary truth.

Proposition B expresses a de re necessity. Proposition A* expresses a de dicto necessity.

If something X lacks logically necessary existence, then even if it has an essence E, it is not a logically necessary truth that X has E, because it is not a logically necessary truth that X exists. What is necessarily true, if thing X has essence E, is that X has E if X exists.

Assuming they exist at all, necessity de dicto is no less metaphysical than necessity de re – no less language-and-convention independent, no less human-mind-independent. There being necessities de dicto does not require that there are essences; there are necessities de re only if there are essences. If they exist at all, de re necessities are logical necessities among things – things including but not limited to propositions. If they exist at all, de dicto necessities are logical necessities only among things that are propositions.

A final point on this topic. Suppose that Water is essentially H₂O is true. Then Necessarily, water (if it exists) is H₂O is true. To each necessity de re there corresponds a necessity de dicto expressible in a corresponding conditional statement. If things have essences, then insofar as our concepts of things are accurate regarding their essences, those concepts will enable us to see de dicto as well as de re necessities.

This account of necessity is controversial and a defense of it would be lengthy and complex,⁶ and though I think it is also successful the purpose of presenting it is simply to explain what is meant here by logical necessity. It is an appropriate meaning for use in discussing the ontological argument.

Purely conceptual proofs and the Ontological Argument

A purely conceptual proof of God's existence is an argument that is valid, has only necessary truths as premises, and has God exists as its conclusion. Such a proof that extends our knowledge – which of course is what is sought – will satisfy (at least something like) the other conditions noted above.

The most famous attempts to provide such a proof constitute various varieties of the Ontological Argument – an argument offered (among many others) by St Anselm in medieval times, Descartes in the modern period, and Alvin Plantinga in contemporary philosophy. In coming to understand this sort of argument, we begin with two definitions:

Definition 1: X is a logically necessary being = X exists is necessarily true (X does not exist is self-contradictory).

Definition 2: X is a causally necessary being = X exists is true and logically contingent, and X is caused to exist is self-contradictory.

A logically necessary being has not causally but logically necessary existence – it exists and it is not possible that it not exist.

Four objections to the notion of logically necessary existence

There are various objections to the very idea of logically necessary existence. Here are four of the most common:

- 1 All necessary propositions are conditional – they have a structure properly expressed in an If A then B form.

- 2 No necessary propositions are existential – none entails that anything actually exists.
- 3 All necessary propositions are tautological – they have a sense property expressed in an All A is A or All AB is B form.
- 4 No necessary statements provide genuine information.

We can take these objections in pairs. Objection 1 tells us that all necessary statements are of the form “if A then B” which neither asserts that A exists nor that B exists. Objection 2 tells us that no necessary statement asserts that anything exists. Both 1 and 2 are false, since There are prime numbers larger than 17 and There is a successor to two obviously are necessary truths but do assert that something exists. Objection 3 tells us that all necessary statements are true by virtue of the meanings of the words they contain, like “All uncles are uncles” and “Any aunt has a niece or nephew.” (It is allowed that there be a rule to the effect that “A” means “B or C” so that a proposition expressible in the form All A is A also is expressible in the form All A is B or C.) Objection 4 tells us that necessary truths provide no genuine information. But both If proposition P is necessarily true, then it is necessarily true that P is necessarily true and If proposition P is necessarily false, then it is necessarily true that P is necessarily false are necessary truths, and they are not tautological and they do provide genuine information. So both 3 and 4 are false.⁷ None of these common objections shows that the notion of logically necessary existence is incoherent.

The Ontological Argument

The Ontological Argument is an attempt to state a series of necessarily true propositions which serve as premises that entail the conclusion God exists. A successful argument of this sort would prove its conclusion to be necessarily true – it would show that God has logically necessary existence. Were any of the four objections just discussed to have succeeded, it would have undermined the ontological argument.

In constructing perhaps the most interesting version of the ontological argument,⁸ we need some further definitions as follows:

Definition 3: Proposition P entails proposition Q if and only if P, but not Q is a contradiction.

Definition 4: Proposition P is a maximal proposition if and only if, for any proposition Q, either P entails Q or P entails not-Q

Definition 5: Each maximal proposition defines an entire possible world.⁹

Definition 6: A being has maximal excellence if and only if it is omnipotent, omniscient, and omnibenevolent in some possible world.

Definition 7: A being has maximal greatness if and only if it has maximal excellence in every possible world.

Definition 8: A proposition is true in all possible worlds if and only if it is necessarily true.¹⁰

There are various versions of the Ontological Argument. Here is one:

- A God is a perfect being.
- B A perfect being has all perfections.
- C Having logically necessary existence is a perfection.
- D God has logically necessary existence (from A, B, C).
- E If God has logically necessary existence then God exists is necessarily true.
- F God exists is necessarily true (from D, E).

While it has played a significant role in the history of philosophy, it remains true that the notion of perfection is hard to define with any precision. If the argument can be stated without appeal to this notion, so much the better. In fact, it can be so stated, and if the argument stated without the notion of a perfection fails, then so does the argument stated with that notion.

The Ontological Argument without the notion of perfection

Here is a formulation that makes no appeal to the notion of a perfection, though it does include certain central concepts that express what the tradition plausibly thinks are qualities that a perfect being would have.

- 1 God has maximal greatness (has maximal excellence in every possible world) is true unless it is self-contradictory.
- 2 God has maximal greatness is not self-contradictory. So:
- 3 God has maximal greatness is true.
- 4 If God has maximal greatness is true then God exists. So:
- 5 God exists.

The argument is plainly valid. Its form is:

- 1 P unless necessarily not-P.
- 2 Not necessarily not-P. So:

- 3 P.
- 4 If P then G. So:
- 5 G.

and that form is logically impeccable. If there are any problems with the argument, then, it is that one or more of its premises are false.

Premise 1 is true. Having maximal greatness is a matter of having maximal excellence in every possible world; having maximal excellence in every possible world is tantamount to necessarily having maximal excellence. It is not hard to see this provided we keep in mind what the notion of maximal greatness involves, namely having being omniscient in all possible worlds. For any quality Q, to say that something has Q in all possible worlds is to say that it is logically necessary that it has Q. This claim is, as premise 1 says, true unless it is a necessary falsehood. Any proposition of the form Necessarily, P is necessarily true if true and necessarily false if false. Necessarily, God has maximal greatness is either true or false; so it is necessarily true or necessarily false. Thus, if it is not necessarily false (i.e., self-contradictory), then it is necessarily true; that is what premise 1 claims.

Premise 3 follows from premises 1 and 2; since God cannot have maximal greatness without existing, premise 4 is true; premises 3 and 4 entail premise 5. Everything depends, then, on whether premise 2 is true. Is it true?

In considering this question, it is helpful to consider some arguments that are analogous to the current version of the Ontological Argument.

The X argument

- 1x Necessarily, God does not exist is true unless it is self-contradictory.
- 2x Necessarily, God does not exist is not self-contradictory. So:
- 3x Necessarily, God does not exist is true.
- 4x If Necessarily, God does not exist is true then God does not exist. So:
- 5x God does not exist.

This argument is also valid, and premise 1x is true for reasons exactly analogous to those noted regarding premise 1. Premise 4X is obviously true. So if premise 2x is true, then the argument is a proof. Is premise 2x true?

The Y argument

- 1y God exists is logically contingent is true unless it is self-contradictory.
- 2y God exists is logically contingent is not self-contradictory. So:

- 3y God exists is logically contingent is true.
- 4y If God exists is logically contingent is true then Necessarily, God exists is false.
- 5y Necessarily, God exists is false.

This argument is also valid. Premise 1y is true for reasons exactly analogous to those that favor 1 and 1x. If it is true that God exists is logically contingent then God exists is logically necessary is false. (So then is God has maximal excellence, which entails God exists is logically necessary.) So if God exists is logically contingent is true, then God has maximal excellence is false, and that is what premise 4y says. So if premise 2y is true, then the Y argument is sound and valid, and thus its conclusion is true. Is 2y true?

The Z argument

- 1z God does not exist is logically contingent is true unless it is self-contradictory.
- 2z God does not exist is logically contingent is not self-contradictory. So:
- 3z God does not exist is logically contingent is true.
- 4z If God does not exist is logically contingent is true then Necessarily, God exists is false.
- 5z Necessarily, God exists is false.

This argument is also valid. Premise 1z is true for reasons exactly analogous to those that favor 1, 1x, and 2y. If it is true that God does not exist is logically contingent then God exists is logically necessary is false. (So then is God has maximal excellence, which entails God exists is logically necessary.) So if God does not exist is logically contingent is true, then Necessarily, God exists is false, and that is what premise 4z says. So if premise 2z is true, the Z argument is sound and valid, and its conclusion is true. Is 2z true?

Summary regarding the Ontological Argument (version 1) and the X, Y, and Z arguments

- A Each argument is logically valid.
- B In each argument, the first premise is true.
- C In each argument, the fourth premise is true.
- D In each argument, only the first, second, and fourth premises are independent; the first and second entail the third, and the third and fourth entail the conclusion.

- E In each argument, if the second premise is true, the argument is sound.
- F Premise 2y is true if and only if premise 2z is true, so we need concern ourselves only with one of them; we will use 2y.
- G It is logically impossible that more than one (or that less than one) of these three premises be true: premise 2 of the Ontological Argument, premise 2x, premise 2y.

What is crucial in evaluating the Ontological Argument is that this argument does not establish which of these three premises is true. It leaves that issue completely open. Hence the Ontological Argument fails as a proof that extends our knowledge. Given the discussion thus far, the point can be put succinctly as follows. Consider:

- o Either God exists is (a) necessarily true, (b) necessarily false, (c) logically contingent and true, or (d) logically contingent and false.

The Ontological Argument requires that (a) be the right alternative. But that argument contains the thesis that (a) is the right alternative – that is what premise 2 of the argument says. No argument is given to the effect that (a) is the right alternative. Granted, (a) does not seem self-contradictory; but nor do any of (b), (c), or (d), each of which is incompatible with (a). So we are left without any reason for picking (a) as the truth.

Another look at the Ontological Argument

- 1 It is logically possible that God has maximal excellence if the concept of God is not contradictory.
- 2 The concept of God is not contradictory. So:
- 3 It is logically possible that God has maximal excellence.
- 4 If it is logically possible that God has maximal excellence, then God has maximal excellence. So:
- 5 God has maximal excellence.
- 6 If God has maximal excellence, then God exists in all possible worlds. So:
- 7 God exists in all possible worlds.
- 8 If God exists in all possible worlds, then necessarily God exists. So:
- 9 Necessarily, God exists.

Exposition of the Ontological Argument

From 3 on, the argument is correct. You might object to 4, but what 4 says is this: Possibly, God has maximal excellence entails God has maximal excellence. What you need to keep in mind is that God has maximal excellence entails God exists in all possible worlds (= Necessarily, God exists). Thus God has maximal excellence ascribes the modality necessarily true to the proposition God has maximal greatness. Thus, given that necessary truths are necessarily necessarily true and necessary falsehoods are necessarily necessarily false, it follows that God has maximal excellence is either necessarily true, or else is a contradiction.

Further discussion of Ontological Argument

There is a problem with the argument, and it starts earlier. It lies exactly in premise 1 (in contrast to version 1, where the problem arises with premise 2). Suppose what is true is The proposition that God exists is logically contingent. Then the following things are true: (i) God exists is not a contradiction; (ii) God does not exist is not a contradiction; and (iii) Necessarily, God exists is a contradiction, and (iv) Necessarily, God does not exist is a contradiction. If (iii) is true, then premise 1 of the Ontological Argument is false. Thus if it is true that The proposition that God exists is logically contingent is true, premise 1 of the argument is false. Nothing in the argument shows that The proposition that God exists is logically contingent is not true. So the argument fails.

A proof that something has logically necessary existence

Consider this brief argument:

- 1 Necessarily, if it is possible that something has logically necessary existence, then something has logically necessary existence.
- 2 It is possible that something has logically necessary existence. So:
- 3 Something has logically necessary existence.

In other terms:

- 1* Necessarily, (Possibly, something has logically necessary existence) entails (Something has logically necessary existence.)

- 2* (Possibly, something has logically necessary existence). So:
 3* (Something has logically necessary existence.)

The reasoning here is simple: 1 and 1* are necessary truths. Premises 2 and 2*, being modal claims, are either necessarily false or necessarily true. Neither 2 nor 2* is necessarily false. So 2 and 2* are necessarily true. The inferences 1 and 2, hence 3 and 1 and 2*, hence 3 are obviously valid. Hence conclusions 3 and 3*, being entailed by necessary truths, are themselves necessary truths. Something has logically necessary existence.

If the ontological argument is sound and valid, then this argument must be sound and valid; its soundness and validity are a necessary, but not a sufficient, condition of the soundness and validity of the Ontological Argument. The simple argument is powerful; perhaps it is a proof that extends our knowledge. But even if this is so, the Ontological Argument itself is not a proof that extends our knowledge.

Empirical proofs, argument strategies, and principles of sufficient reason¹¹

In contrast to a purely conceptual proof of God's existence, an empirical proof of God's existence is an argument that is valid, has at least one logically contingent truth among its premises, has only true premises, and has God exists as its conclusion. Such a proof that extends our knowledge – which of course is what is sought – will satisfy the other conditions noted above. There are various starting points for such arguments, and various strategies for going on from the beginning. For example, one might begin with the fact that there is a universe, though it is logically possible that there might not have been, or that there is some particular thing (say, oneself), though it is logically possible that there may not have been that particular thing, or the fact that the universe is intelligible (science is possible), though it is logically possible that there be a universe that is not intelligible. Suppose one begins with the fact that there is a universe, though it is logically possible that there may not have been. Then there are at least these strategies for continuing.

- 1 The everlasting world strategy: prove that the world is everlasting and dependent, then infer to a necessarily independent being on which the dependent everlasting world depends.
- 2 The world-has-a-beginning strategy: prove that the world is not everlasting past, then infer to a cause of the world beginning to exist.

- 3 The inclusive strategy: prove it the case that the world is everlasting and dependent or that the world is not everlasting past; then infer to there being either a necessarily independent being on which the dependent everlasting world depends or a necessarily independent cause of the world beginning to exist.

Which strategy a philosopher chooses may, but need not, depend on what her religious beliefs are. A Christian, like Augustine, who believes that God created time and the universe together (that God's creating a universe is both necessary and sufficient for there being time) will suppose that the universe is everlasting in one sense – there is no time at which there was no universe – but will also suppose that it is impossible that there be a time T1 at which the universe was not created and then another later time T2 at which the universe was created. We might call this universe-time-together creation view. In another sense, in holding this view, she will deny that the world is everlasting; on her view, there will have been a first time – time will go back so far, and no further. But a Jewish, Christian, or Muslim monotheist might perfectly well hold that time has no beginning and that God created the world at some time prior to which time flowed but no universe existed. We can call this the creation in time view. A monotheist might even hold that the universe has always existed, and the doctrine that God created the universe entails that the universe always depends on God for its existence, has always done so, and will do so as long as it exists at all. We can call this the beginningless creation view. On this view, God created the universe entails The universe has always existed in such a way that it depends on God, God does not depend for God's existence on there being a universe, and were God to cease sustaining the universe in existence, it would not exist but God would still exist. But there being a first time, or a first moment at which the universe began to exist, will not be entailed. A monotheist can accept any of these alternatives. Typically Jewish, Christian, and Muslim monotheists have accepted either a universe-time-together or a creation in time perspective. Hindu monotheism, by contrast, holds to a beginningless creation perspective. This has largely to do with their interpretations of their religious texts.

A philosopher might think that one could not decide between these alternatives by appeal to anything other than Scripture, and wish to base his arguments only on what he thought was philosophically accessible. In this case, the third strategy may well seem attractive.¹² In any case, each strategy will require its own version of the general thesis that whatever can be explained has an explanation – its own formulation of the Principle of Sufficient Reason (PSR).

Principles of Sufficient Reason

- 1 The Everlasting World Strategy requires something like this: (PSR₁) If it is logically possible that something depends for its existence on something else, then it does depend for its existence on something else or What can depend for its existence on something else does depend for its existence on something else.
- 2 The World Has A Beginning Strategy requires something like this: (PSR₂) What begins to exist must have a cause of existence or Nothing can simply begin to exist without being caused to do so.
- 3 The Inclusive Strategy requires something like this: (PSR₁) and (PSR₂).

Crucial premises

The different strategies will also require somewhat different premises along these lines.

- 1 The Everlasting World Strategy requires some such premise as this: It is logically impossible that everything that exists exists dependency.
- 2 The World Has A Beginning Strategy requires some such premise as this: It is logically impossible that everything that exists has had a beginning of existence.
- 3 The Inclusive Strategy requires something like this: (a) It is logically impossible that everything that exists exists dependency and (b) it is logically impossible that everything that exists has had a beginning of existence.

The idea is that if the world is beginningless past, it does not exist independently (because of the truth of (a)) and if the world has a beginning it does not exist independently (because of the truth of (b)).

The inclusive strategy is safer with respect to one of its basic premises which is a weaker claim than its analogues – one who uses it need not care whether the world ever began to exist or not. But it is riskier with respect to its version of the Principle of Sufficient Reason (it requires both PSR₁ and PSR₂).

Differences in conclusions

The strategies, of course, will also yield somewhat different conclusions. Aristotle wants to infer from the world's existence to God's existence in a way that does not require that God have made any choices or performed any actions. Semitic and Hindu monotheists want to infer from the world's existence to God's existence in a way that does require that God has chosen to create and that God created (the choice and the act may be the same). Even if a monotheist does not think that you can successfully infer from the world's existence to God's existence, she typically will have a view about how the world is related to God. Ramanuja, for example, rejects any inference from the world's existence to God's existence, but holds that the world is everlastingly dependent for its existence on God. Among the most famous and influential of arguments for monotheism are Aquinas's Five Ways.

Arguments by Thomas Aquinas

Aquinas's arguments are of considerable historical interest. For our present purposes, however, three questions matter: (i) do any of his arguments prove their intended conclusion?; (ii) if not, can one learn from them how to frame a more powerful argument for their intended conclusion or something much like it?; (iii) do his arguments suggest some other approach to the question of the truth or falsity of monotheism? Questions (i) and (ii) are considered in this chapter; the third receives attention in the later chapter on Faith and Reason.

Aquinas asks whether the existence of God can be proved and answers in the affirmative. He then offers five arguments for God's existence followed by an argument that the being referred to in the conclusion of the first argument is the same as that referred to in the conclusion of each of the other arguments. Here, too, beginning with a few definitions will enable us to state complex arguments with much greater simplicity than we could without them.

Reflexive and irreflexive relations

Aquinas's arguments deal with certain relationships he takes to hold between one thing in the world and another thing in the world, or between the world and God. Here are some fundamental features of relations:¹³

Definition 1: Relation R , holding between X and Y , is reflexive if X has R to Y entails Y has R to X .

If Jack is the same height as Jill, then Jill is the same height as Jack; being the same height as is a reflexive relation.

Definition 2: Relation R , holding between X and Y , is irreflexive if X has R to Y entails Y does not have R to X .

If Tim is Tom's father, then Tom is not Tim's father; being a father, being a mother, being a parent are irreflexive relations.

It will be useful to have two further ways of talking about relations. Let us say that if X has R to Y then X has R forwardly to Y, and that Y has R backwardly to X. Reflexive relations between X and Y are had both forwardly and backwardly by both X and Y. Irreflexive relations between X and Y are had only forwardly by X and only backwardly by Y.

General structure

The general structure – the logical skeleton, as it were – of Aquinas's arguments, typically called the "Five Ways," as we will see, can be expressed either as:

- 1 There is an X and a Y such that X bears relation R to Y.
- 2 Either (a) there is an infinite series of items such that each member has R both forwardly to something and backwardly to something, or (b) there is some item that has R only forwardly.
- 3 Not-(a). So:
- 4 (b).

or as

- 1 There is an X and a Y such that X has R to Y.
- 2 Either (a) there is an infinite series of items such that each member has R both forwardly to something and backwardly to something, or (b) there is some item that has Y only forwardly.
- 3 If (a) then (b).
- 4 If not-(a) then (b). So:
- 5 (b).

Chronological versus concurrent causes

If we are to understand Aquinas, it is important to distinguish between what we will call chronological versus concurrent causes.

Definition 3: X is a chronological cause of Y if and only if X's doing something or having some quality at some time before T is necessary for Y at T.

Putting the water over the fire, causing it to boil; turning the key in the ignition, causing the car to start; throwing the ball, causing the window to break, are chronological causes.

Definition 4: X is a concurrent cause of Y if and only if X doing something or having some quality at T is a necessary condition of Y at T.

Holding a door to keep it open; holding one's breath to keep one's lungs full; pushing the bell to keep the bell ringing are cases of concurrent causation. It is typically cases of concurrent, not chronological, causation that Aquinas has in mind in offering his arguments. Thus criticisms based on the assumption that he has chronological causation in mind will be off target.

Each of Aquinas's five arguments concerns a different relationship as follows.

Argument 1: something moving/changing something else.

Argument 2: something causing something to come to exist.

Argument 3: X can cease to exist by becoming Y.

Argument 4: things having different degrees of worth.

Argument 5: something behaving at least as if it were seeking a goal.

Domains, forwardness, and backwardness

A finite domain is a collection having a finite number of members; a pile of forty rocks, a flock of seventy geese, a galaxy of a million stars are finite domains. Suppose that we have a domain of three things – Al, Bob, and Carl. Suppose that an irreflexive relationship – say, being a father – relates Al and Bob, and Bob and Carl. Within this domain, Al stands in the relation being a father only forwardly, Carl stands in the relation being a father only backwardly, and Bob stands in the relation being a father forwardly toward Carl and backwardly toward Al. If this domain is all there is, Al has no father and Carl has no children. This domain is ordered by an irreflexive relationship. Each member of the domain is related to every other by an instance of the same irreflexive relationship – in the case just described, by being a father.

Consider a different domain – a domain denned in terms of its members being ordered by a particular sort of dependence relationship. The sort of dependence in question is non-reciprocal dependence where B non-reciprocally depends for existence on A if and only if B depends for its existence on A and A does not depend for its existence on B. Suppose, then, that there exists a domain of things each of which stands in a non-reciprocal dependence relation to something, and that this domain is finite. Then it follows that some member of this domain stands in the relationship of non-reciprocal dependence only forwardly. The only alternatives are that the domain is infinite (which we have stipulated is not so) or that there is a circle of non-reciprocal dependence, which is impossible. If B non-reciprocally depends on A, and C non-reciprocally depends on B, and A non-reciprocally depends on C, then the relationship between A and B is reciprocal dependence, not non-reciprocal. A circle of non-reciprocal relationships is logically impossible. So some member of the domain must stand in the relationship of non-reciprocal dependence only forwardly¹⁴ – i.e., must exist independently of the other members of the domain ordered by the irreflexive relationship of non-reciprocal dependence.

Aquinas takes this relationship of non-reciprocal dependence to be one involving concurrent causation – if the existence of A fully explains the existence of B, then so long as B exists it must be the case that A is causing it to exist.

It is not obvious that the world of physical things and nondivine minds is a finitely large domain of things ordered by the relationship of non-reflexive dependence. But that it is such a domain is something that at least the first three of Aquinas’s arguments require.

Change, potentiality, actuality¹⁵

Aquinas defines change in a way reminiscent of Aristotle’s philosophy.

Definition 5: X is in actuality with respect to some property Q if and only if X has Q.

Definition 6: X is in potentiality with respect to some property Q if and only if (i) X does not have Q, but (ii) X is the sort of thing capable of having Q.

Elk cannot be prime numbers, eggs cannot run faster than hares, and pigs cannot fly; so these things are not in potentiality with regard to these properties. Elk can be dyed pink, eggs can be swallowed whole, and pigs can be dressed in tuxedos, so they are in potentiality with respect to these properties. Elk have legs, eggs have shells, and pigs have ears, so they are in actuality with regard to these properties.

Definition 7: X changes with respect to property Q if and only if X moves from potentiality to actuality, or from actuality to potentiality, with respect to Q.¹⁶

Definition 8: Y causes X to change with respect to property Q if and only if Y causes X to move from potentiality to actuality, or from actuality to potentiality, with respect to Q.

The First Way

The First Way concerns things being caused to move, in the usual sense of going from one place to another but also in the more general sense of simply changing, in position or some other way. It is assumed that X changing Y with respect to Q is a relationship that is non-reciprocal – is analogous to non-reciprocal dependence. Thus the idea is that it cannot be the case that X's changing Y with respect to Q causes Y's becoming Q only if Y's becoming Q causes Y's causing Z to become Q and Z's becoming Q causes X's causing Y to become Q. The argument goes as follows.

- 1 Some things change.
- 2 If X changes at time T then there is something Y that changes X at T (understood as that Y is something different from X).
- 3 Either (a) there is an infinite series of changed and changing beings (i.e., a series each member of which is both a changed and a changing thing) or (b) there is some being that is a changing being (a cause of motion/change) but is not a changed being (something that changes).
- 4 Not-(a). So:
- 5 (b).

Aquinas offers a subsidiary argument for premise 2:

- 2a For all times T, and all X, X is in actuality with respect to moving at T or X is in potentiality regarding motion at T.
- 2b If X is in potentiality regarding motion at T, then X is not moving at T.
- 2c If X is not moving at T, then X cannot cause motion at T.
- 2d Nothing can cause its own motion at T (since in order to do so it would have to both be in actuality regarding motion at T and in potentiality regarding motion at T, and that is impossible).
- 2e No motion can be uncaused.

Hence:

- 2 If X changes at time T then there is something Y that changes X at T (understood as that that Y is something different from X).

The issue of whether there can be self-moving or self-changing things was hotly disputed in the medieval period. Scotus, for example, offered powerful arguments against Aquinas in this regard. But there is to be a replacement for premise 2 that restricts its basic idea to cases of which it is true, and we will follow this strategy.

Self-change

The First Way, if successful, would establish the existence of a cause of change that did not change.¹⁷ Premise 2 – the denial of self-motion – is apparently problematic. There seem to be cases of self-movement – one’s walking to the store, for example – and of self-caused change that does not involve movement from place to place – deliberately stopping thinking about one thing in order to reflect on another. But there are lots of changes in which something is caused to change by something else, and the best strategy for defending Aquinas here seems to be this: argue that, with respect to the sorts of qualities with which the arguments are concerned, self-change is not an option. Something depending for existence on itself – a physical object or a human mind, for example, having some feature by virtue of which it existed independently of anything else – is not a promising notion. Perhaps the simplest defense of Aquinas here is to argue as follows: we know that every physical thing, and that every human mind,¹⁸ in fact depends for its existence on the existence of other things. But being dependent is an essential property of everything that has it; X is dependent for existence on something else entails Necessarily, X is dependent for existence on something else. Further, Nothing can cause its own existence is a necessary truth; in order for something to cause its own existence, it must do so at some time T. Then, at some time T, something that causes its own existence must both not exist in order to be caused and exist in order to do the causing – a feat that is logically impossible to perform.

Even if one provides this line of reasoning on Aquinas’s behalf, however – even if one grants that a version of, or replacement for, premise 2 that is restricted to some such quality as non-reciprocally causing change will serve his purposes even if some instances of self-change are possible – his case is not made. Consider this pair of claims:

- T1: For any time T1, everything that exists at T1 depends for its existence on something else that exists at T1.
- T2: For any time T2, everything that exists at T2 was caused to come into existence at T2 by something that existed at T1.

The sort of dependence that T2 describes is non-reciprocal and consecutive. The sort of dependence that T1 describes is reciprocal and concurrent. The First Way requires that there be a sort of dependence that is non-reciprocal and concurrent. Suppose that T1 and T2 are true and describe the only sorts of dependence there are. Then the First Way fails. Nothing in the First Way proves that T1 and T2 are not true and descriptive of the only sorts of dependence that there are. So the First Way is not a proof that extends our knowledge. Perhaps there is the sort of non-reciprocal dependence that Aquinas requires, but we have no proof of it here.

Infinite series¹⁹

It is not obvious why there cannot be an infinite series of changed and changing things, whether we have chronological or concurrent cases of causation in mind. We have seen why premise 4 – the rejection of an infinite series of things changing one another regarding quality Q – is needed. Aware of this, Aquinas offers a subsidiary argument for premise 4:

- 4a An infinite series has no first (earliest?) member.
- 4b If a series has no first (earliest?) members, it has no later or succeeding members
- 4c If a series has neither earlier nor later members, it has no members.
- 4d No series can have no members. So:
- 4 Not-(a) – there is not an infinite series of changed and changing beings (i.e., a series each member of which is both a changed and a changing thing).

Aquinas²⁰ admits that there can be a temporally beginningless causal series; so presumably it is concurrent, not chronological, causality that Aquinas has in mind in this argument (and elsewhere in the Five Ways). The argument for the fourth premise is puzzling. There were sharp disputes among medieval philosophers as to whether an infinite series was possible. Perhaps the sub-proof rests on the idea that, in constructing a series, one has to begin somewhere, and if one does not start with a first thing one will never construct even a two-member, let alone an infinitely membered, series. Then the argument is correct but irrelevant, since those who contend that there are series that are infinite does not contend that we have to construct them. One can reply that any actual series must be one that could in principle be constructed by someone, and an infinitely membered series could not be. But then we need another argument that any infinite series must be one that could in principle be constructed, and another to show that an infinitely membered series does not fit this description. Plainly nothing in the argument of the First Way, in either its main or its subsidiary lines of reasoning, provides anything like this. Thus the First Way seems not to be a proof of its conclusion.

The Second Way

Again we begin with a couple of definitions.

Definition 9: X is in motion per accidens if and only if X moves only because X is part of or is located in Y and X moves only because Y moves.

The car moves per se. A cup of coffee set in the cup holder of a moving car moves per accidens.

Definition 10: X moves per se if and only if X moves and X does not move per accidens.

The Second Way runs as follows; it takes coming to be or coming to exist as a change.

- 1 If X comes to be at T then X's coming to be at T is caused.
- 2 Nothing can cause its own coming to exist (it would have both to exist to do the causing and not exist to be caused to come to be).
- 3 If X comes to be at T then X is caused to come to be at T by something other than X.
- 4 Either (a) there is an infinite series of beings that come to be and are caused to come to be by other beings that were caused to come to be, or (b) there is a being that causes other things to come to be but is not itself caused to come to be.
- 5 Not-(a). So:
- 6 (b)

Aquinas argues for premise 5 in this manner:

- 5a An infinite series has no first member.
- 5b If a series has no first member, then it has no later members.
- 5c A series having neither a first nor later members has no members; a series without members cannot exist. So:

- 5 There is not an infinite series of beings that come to be and are caused to come to be by other beings that were caused to come to be.

The argument for premise 5 here is identical to the argument for premise 4 of the First Way, and hence has exactly the same problems. Further, coming to exist is not a change in the thing which comes to exist; assuming the definition of change offered above, it is not a change – non-existent things have neither potentiality nor actuality. It is possible that X, which does not exist at time T, comes to exist at time T1 does not entail X, which does not exist, has the potentiality to exist; X has some potentiality or other entails X exists. So the Second Way is not a proof.

The Third Way

Two simple definitions are helpful here.

Definition 11: X is generable if and only if X can be caused to come to be.

Definition 12: X is corruptible if and only if X can be caused to change and can be caused to cease to exist.

Aristotle and Aquinas seem to assume X can be caused to change entails X can be caused to cease to exist, and conversely, so that necessarily anything that meets one of the conditions of being generable also meets the other. It is not at all obvious that this is so. In any case, the Third Way goes like this:

- 1 If X is generable and corruptible then X's non-existence is possible.
- 2 There are corruptible and generable things. So:
- 3 There are things whose non-existence is possible (from 1 and 2).
- 4 Assume for the sake of showing it to be false that: For all X, X's non-existence is possible.²¹
- 5 If for all X, X's non-existence is possible, then there is some time T such that nothing exists at T.
- 6 There is some time T such that nothing exists at T (from 4 and 5).
- 7 It is impossible that anything comes to exist without its being caused to do so by something that already exists.
- 8 If there is some time T such that nothing exists at T, then for any time T* later than T, nothing exists at T*.
- 9 Nothing exists at T* (from 5 through 8).
- 10 If there is some time T such that nothing exists at T, T has already occurred. So:

- 11 T has already occurred.
- 12 If T has already occurred, then nothing exists now. So:
- 13 Nothing exists now (from 10 through 12).
- 14 If for all X, X's non-existence is possible, then nothing exists now (from 4 through 12).
- 15 It is false that nothing exists now. So:
- 16 It is false that for all X, X's non-existence is possible.
- 17 If it is false that for all X, X's non-existence is possible, then something exists whose non-existence is impossible. So:
- 18 Something exists whose non-existence is impossible (from 16 and 17).

Aquinas's Third Way is read in different ways. Aquinas is read as saying either:

- (a) It is impossible that all generable things exist at every single time. (= Necessarily, every generable thing at some time or other does not exist.)
or:
- (b) It is impossible that, at every time whatever, some generable thing exists. (Necessarily, at some time or other, no generable thing exists.)

Compare Necessarily, every elk passes on sooner or later; this is analogous to (a). Consider Necessarily, at some time, there are no elk at all; this is analogous to (b). What Aquinas needs is (b); (a) will not help him. Aquinas also needs:

- (c) It is impossible that everything that exists is a generable being.

This indication of what he requires is relevant to two fallacious inferences he is often charged with making in the Third Way; either would, of course, invalidate the argument.

Inference one: from A to B

Consider:

- A For all X, it is possible that X corrupt.
- B It is possible that everything (simultaneously) corrupt.

A world W of which A is true might be one of which it was also true that:

- C It is not possible that W be entirely unpopulated.

But a world of which B was true is a world of which C could not be true. Hence inferring from A to B is fallacious.²² Inferring from (a) to (b) is tantamount to inferring from A to B. If Aquinas either inferred from (a) to (b), or simply did not adequately distinguish between them, the argument fails.

Inference two: from D to E

D Everything at some time fails to exist.

E Sometime, everything fails to exist.²³

Everything is green at some time or other does not entail At some time or other, everything is green. Similarly, D does not entail E. Again, the inference from (a) to (b) is tantamount to inferring from D to E. If Aquinas either inferred from (a) to (b), or simply did not adequately distinguish between them, the argument fails.

The gist of these criticisms is that even if at some time or other, each thing that exists will pass out of existence, it does not follow that they will all pass out of existence at the same time, and so long as earlier members can generate later ones, things will go on. If Aquinas is not entitled to infer from (a) to (b), then even if he is entitled to infer from (b) to (c) this will not help, since he has no legitimate way to get to (b).

Aquinas is also criticized for claiming that the alleged time at which everything would simultaneously pass away would already have occurred; why not regard the proof (if it did succeed) as proving that at some future time there will not be any generable things? His answer is that if there have been generable things for only a finite time past, then there had to be a cause of there coming to be generable things and so there is something that is not itself a generable thing, and if there have always been generable things, then an infinite time has passed and in any infinite time we would have reached the time at which everything has passed away. We can afford not to enter into this controversy.²⁴

The first three of Aquinas's Five Ways begin by reference to the fact that things exist that might not have existed and that depend for their existence on something else, and that things change. They then require some such claim as What can depend for its existence on something else does depend for its existence on something else and What changes is changed by something else, as well as such claims as If there are things that exist that depend for their existence on something else, then there is something that exists independent of anything else and If things are caused to change by something else, then there is something that causes change without itself ever changing. In part for reasons given as we explained these arguments, none of them constitutes a proof that extends our knowledge. Thus the results of examining these arguments has not been very positive; none seems even close to a proof that God exists. But rearrangement and revision of the materials these arguments contain provide something stronger.

Some further definitions

If these materials do yield a stronger – even a successful – argument, perhaps they do so via the following argument. Once again, some definitions will make it possible to state the argument less complexly than otherwise. Further, the way the premises are stated is intended to keep them from being open to various standard objections. Note that nothing in the following argument requires that there not be various sorts of self-motion or self-change and it requires no assumptions about whether there is an infinite series of anything.

By way of reminder:

Definition 1: P is a logically contingent proposition = neither P nor not-P is self-contradictory.

Definition 2: P is a logically necessary proposition = not-P is self-contradictory.

Further:

Definition 3: P is an existential proposition = P entails a proposition of the form X exists.

Definition 4: It is logically possible that P's truth be explained = There is some proposition Q such that Q's truth explains P's truth is not self-contradictory.

To give an analysis: if it is logically possible that the existence of something X be explained, then it is logically possible that X not exist, and if it is logically possible that the truth of a proposition P be explained, it is logically possible that it not be true.

Given these definitions, we can state another version of the Cosmological Argument.

Cosmological Argument, stage one

- 1 If it is logically possible that the truth of a logically contingent existential proposition be explained, then there actually is an explanation of its truth (whether we know what it is or not).

Premise 1 is a version of the Principle of Sufficient Reason.

- 2 There exist things whose existence it is logically possible to explain is a true logically contingent existential proposition.

There are rose bushes, there might not have been rose bushes, and there is an explanation of there being rose bushes; hence premise 2 is true.

- 3 There is an explanation of the truth of There exist things whose existence it is logically possible to explain (from 1, 2).

Premise 3 obviously follows from premises 1 and 2. So if they are true, so is it. The success of stage one depends on what is true regarding the first premise.

Cosmological Argument, stage two

- 4 The truth of There exist things whose existence it is logically possible to explain cannot be explained by there being things whose existence it is logically possible to explain (the existence of those things is just what is to be explained).

Suppose that Pat wants to know why there now are golden retriever puppies. She is told that there are golden retriever parents. She asks why there are golden retriever parents. She is told about golden retriever grandparents. Pat then wants to know why there are any golden retrievers at all. She cannot now be told about golden retriever parents, grandparents, great grandparents, or the like; these will all be things she wants to know about – why have any golden retrievers at all existed? Here, one either refuses to answer, claims that there being golden retrievers is just a fundamental feature of the world, or explains that there were non-golden retrievers that caused there to be golden retrievers.

If Pat asks why there have ever been any possibly explicable things at all that exist though they might not have existed, she cannot properly be told about there being possibly explicable things that exist but might not have existed; those are the things she asks about. So one can refuse to answer, claim that there being possibly explicable things that exist but might not have existed is a fundamental feature of the universe, or refer to something that is not such as to exist and be possibly explicable though it might not have existed. This line of thought is correct, and is what premise 4 says.

- 5 That a logically contingent existential proposition is true can only be explained by some other existential proposition being true.

If, in the relevant sense of explanation, P's truth entails Q's truth, then P entails Q. No existential proposition is entailed by a set of propositions that does not contain any existential propositions.

- 6 If an existential proposition does not concern something whose existence it is logically possible to explain, it concerns something whose existence is logically impossible to explain.

These exhaust the possibilities.

- 7 The truth of There exist things whose existence it is logically possible to explain can only be explained by a true existential proposition concerning something whose existence it is logically impossible to explain (from 4, 5, 6).
- 8 Some existential proposition concerning something whose existence it is logically impossible to explain, and whose existence can explain the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain, is true (from 3, 7).

Premise 4 is plainly true; whatever Xs are, there being Xs cannot explain there being Xs. Nor can the existence of something that might not have existed be explained other than by reference to things that exist; the existence of contingent things can only be explained by reference to something that exists, not by reference to something that doesn't exist. So premise 5 is true. Necessarily, for anything X that exists, either it is logically possible that X's existence be explained or it isn't; that is what premise 6 says. If (i) X's existence can be explained, and (ii) can be explained only by the truth of a type A proposition or by the truth of a type B proposition, and (iii) cannot be explained by the truth of a type A proposition, then it follows that (iv) X's existence can be explained by the truth of a type B proposition. Premise 7 applies this reasoning to the notions of propositions concerning the existence of things whose existence can be explained and propositions concerning the existence of things whose existence cannot be explained. Premises 4, 5, 6 entail 7 and 3 and 7 entail 8; if they are true (and they are) so is it. Hence stage two is successful.

Cosmological argument, stage three

- 9 If some existential proposition concerning something whose existence it is logically impossible to explain, and whose existence can explain the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain, is true, then something exists whose existence it is logically impossible to explain and whose existence can explain the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain.
- 10 Something exists whose existence it is logically impossible to explain and whose existence can explain the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain (from 8, 9).

Premises 8 and 9 entail step 10, and premise 9 is, I take it, a necessary truth. So stage three succeeds. The conclusion thus far – Something exists whose existence it is logically impossible to explain and whose existence can explain the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain – is interesting all by itself. The crucial premise is the first:

If it is logically possible that the truth of a logically contingent existential proposition be explained, then there actually is an explanation of its truth (whether we know what it is or not).

Premise 1 is a version of the Principle of Sufficient Reason. Call it PSR*.

Suppose one claims the truth of every logically contingent proposition has an explanation, and that it cannot be the case that the truth of every logically contingent proposition is explicable by reference to the truth of other logically contingent propositions. Then one will be claiming that there is some logically contingent proposition whose truth is explicable by reference to some true but not logically contingent proposition – some logically necessary truth. If P's truth explains Q's truth entails P entails Q, then one is claiming that a necessary truth entails a logically contingent truth. This is necessarily false – if Q is a logically contingent proposition, it is possibly false. No necessary truth is possibly false. Were a necessary truth to entail a logically contingent proposition, then it would be possibly false. Hence no necessary truth can entail a logically contingent proposition. If there are any true logically contingent propositions – and there plainly are – then either every one of them is explicable true by reference to some other, whose truth is explicable by reference to some other, and so on, or some among them are true but their truth cannot be explained. PSR* is compatible with all this. It requires no attempt to explain contingent propositions only by reference to necessary truths, and it is compatible with there being an infinite number of contingent truths, each explained by some other contingent proposition. It is also compatible with the fact that, if there are any logically contingent propositions – and there plainly are – then some must be true: if Q is a logically contingent proposition, so is $\text{not-}Q$, and of $(Q \text{ and } \text{not-}Q)$ one must be true.

What it does require is that there being logically contingent true existential statements is possibly explicable – as it is – and hence that it has an actual explanation. If it does have an explanation, it seems that the Cosmological Argument has the right sort of explanation. Obviously no necessary truth will explain it, and no possibly explicable contingent proposition will explain it, and no non-existential statement will explain it. What is left, since necessary falsehoods and contingent falsehoods explain nothing, is a logically contingent existential statement whose truth is necessarily inexplicable. While it is true that of any pair composed of a logically contingent existential statement and its denial, one must be true, it might always be that it was the denial that was true. So it is not a logical necessity that there be true logically contingent existential statements. There remains, then, this question: is it contingently inexplicable that there are true logically contingent existential statements? That there are such statements is possibly explicable, so if there is no explanation of there being such, there is a perfectly intelligible question – Why are there true logically contingent existential propositions? – that might perfectly well have had an answer, but that in fact has none. What PSR^* denies is that this is possible – the possibly explicable is actually explicable.

Is PSR^* true? There does not seem to be anything more obviously true than PSR^* from which it follows. PSR^* does not seem to be contradictory, and if it is true, it is necessarily true. So it is, if not contradictory, then necessarily true. But (I) It is contingently inexplicable that there are logically contingent true existential statements is not obviously contradictory, and it is, if true, then necessarily true. So if it is not contradictory, then it is necessarily true. Nothing in the Cosmological Argument shows that it is PSR^* rather than (I) that is true. So the Cosmological Argument is not a proof that extends our knowledge.

There is a bit more to be said regarding PSR^* . A standard objection to weaker formulations of the Cosmological Argument is that if one infers from the world to God, and it is logically possible that God not exist, then one might as well have stopped with the world. A Cosmological Argument with PSR^* as an essential premise, assuming the remainder to be crafted in line with PSR^* 's content, will be subject to no such objection. Further, if one rejects PSR^* one is left with an ultimate mystery, an intelligible and basic question to which there might have been an answer, but is not. Reject PSR^* and mystery lies on your side of the fence, not on the monotheists' side.

Cosmological Argument, stage four

It is at least not unreasonable to accept PSR*, and it is worth seeing how the argument that requires it continues. A few additional definitions will serve the familiar service of simplifying the statement of the argument.

- D4 Being X has necessary existential security = X exists, and X is caused to exist or depends for its existence on something else is self-contradictory.
- D5 Q is a basic property of X = X has Q, and X has no property Q* such that *X has Q explains the truth of X has Q.
- D6 Q is a non-basic property of X = X has Q, and X has some property Q* such that *X has Q explains the truth of X has Q.
- D7 X has logically necessary existence = X exists, our concept of X is accurate relative to X's existence and X does not exist is self-contradictory.
- D8 X has logically contingent existence = X exists, our concept of X is accurate relative to X's existence, and neither X exists nor X does not exist is self-contradictory.

Note that:

- (i) X has necessary existential security does not entail X has logically necessary existence;
- (ii) X has logically necessary existence does entail X has necessary existential security;
- (iii) whatever exists has either logically necessary or logically contingent existence;
- (iv) while if it is logically possible that the existence of something be explained, it follows that it is logically possible that the thing not exist, it is not true that if it is logically possible that it not exist, then it is logically possible that its existence be explained;
- (v) while it is true that if it is logically possible that the truth of a proposition be explained, it is logically possible that the proposition not be true, it does not follow that if it is logically possible that a proposition not be true, then it is logically possible its truth be explained.

Now we can begin stage four.

- 11 X's existence is logically impossible to explain and its existence can explain the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain is true only if X has necessary existential security is true.
- 12 If something exists whose existence it is logically impossible to explain and whose existence can explain the existence of things

- whose existence it is logically possible to explain, something has necessary existential security.
- 13 Something has necessary existential security.
 - 14 Both explaining the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain and having necessary existential security are non-basic properties of anything that has them.
 - 15 If having necessary existential security is a non-basic property of anything that has it, then the something that has necessary existential security has some other property whose possession explains its having necessary existential security.
 - 16 The something that has necessary existential security has some other property whose possession explains its having necessary existential security.
 - 17 The only properties that something might have that would explain its having necessary existential security are A: having logically necessary existence or B: being omnipotent, omniscient, and morally perfect.
 - 18 Something has A or B.
 - 19 The concept of something that has A but lacks B is the concept of an abstract object, and since abstract objects lack causal powers they cannot explain the existence of anything whose existence it is logically possible to explain; thus having A will not explain anything having the property explaining the existence of things whose existence it is not logically impossible to explain.
 - 20 The concept of a being that has B but lacks A is the concept of a being that has causal powers and whose existence can explain the existence of anything whose existence it is logically possible to explain; thus having B will explain anything having the property explaining the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain.
 - 21 The concept of a being that has B and also has A is also the concept of a being that has causal powers and whose existence can explain the existence of anything whose existence it is logically possible to explain; thus having A and B will explain anything having the property explaining the existence of things whose existence it is logically possible to explain.
 - 22 Something exists that has B.
 - 23 The concept of something that has B is the concept of God, conceived either as having logically necessary existence or as having logically contingent existence, but in either case as possessing necessary existential security and causal powers that can explain the existence of anything whose existence it is logically possible to explain.
 - 24 God exists.

Suppose that God exists, and is omnipotent and omniscient. Then God will lack no power, and no knowledge, failure to have which would allow some enemy to do God in. God's existence is utterly safe; it is logically impossible that this being be destroyed from without. Suppose God is also perfectly good. A perfectly good being won't commit suicide or decide. There are no conditions under which a perfectly good being who is omnipotent and omniscient will ever decide that destruction of itself would be a good thing for it to do. It is logically impossible that such a being, while remaining perfectly good, will cause itself to implode. Were it ever to do so, or act in some other wrong way, then it would always know it would do so. A being that always knew that it would act wrongly, and never did anything about it, would never be morally perfect after all.²⁵

God's moral perfection is conceived by monotheists in two different ways. On one account, what is true is Necessarily, God is morally perfect; on the other, what is logically contingent and true is God is morally perfect.²⁶ On the former account, it is logically impossible that God commit decide. On the latter account, it is not logically impossible that God commit decide, though one may properly trust God not to do so. On neither account of divine moral perfection is it logically possible that God depend on anything for God's existence.

Two points relevant to the Cosmological Argument

Consider two claims:

- 1 Possibly, X is contingent entails X is contingent if contingent means logically contingent (= neither necessarily true nor necessarily false).
- 2 Possibly, X is contingent does not entail X is contingent if contingent means depends for existence on something distinct from itself.

The Cosmological Argument requires that both of these claims be true.

Argument for 1

A proposition has its modality necessarily; thus whatever modality a proposition lacks, it lacks necessarily; logical contingency is a modality; hence whatever has it has it necessarily, and whatever lacks it lacks it necessarily; hence if it is possible that a proposition is contingent, then it is.

Argument for 2

It is not logically impossible that X have logically contingent existence and yet it be false that X depends for existence on something else – a logically contingent and necessarily independent being would fit this description, for example.

Hence both 1 and 2 are true.

Conclusion

Besides requiring PSR*, this version of the Cosmological Argument is strongest if it can be shown that Necessarily, God exists is false. Only then (if at all) can one infer to the cause of possibly explicable logically contingent beings having the properties that a logically contingent being must have if its existence is to be necessarily inexplicable.

A supplementary argument

An argument distinct from the Cosmological Argument that nonetheless dwells in the same conceptual neighborhood is the following:

- 10a It is logically possible that an omniscient being exists.
- 10b If it is logically possible that an omniscient being exists, then it is logically possible that an omniscient being destroy everything material. So:
- 10c It is logically possible that an omniscient being destroy everything material. (from 10, 10b)
- 10d If it is logically possible that an omniscient being destroy everything material, then nothing material has necessary existential security. So:
- 10e Nothing material has necessary existential security. (from 10c, 10d)

Thus far, the argument is obviously valid and the independent (non-inferred) premises seem to be true. If this is correct, it is a useful supplement to the Cosmological Argument. A natural off-shoot is this argument:

- 10e1 If nothing material has necessary existential security, then something exists that is not material. So:
- 10e2 Something exists that is not material.
- 10e3 If something exists that is not material, then materialism is false. So:
- 10e4 Materialism is false.

The truth of 10e1 requires the conclusion of stage three of the Cosmological Argument, i.e., premise 10, and is exactly as secure as that premise is.

Aquinas's Fifth Way

The Fifth Way is one version of the argument from design. To say that something seeks its own end is to say that it seeks its own flourishing as a member of its kind. The following characterization of the Fifth Way reads it as asserting that each generable body seeks its own end, not that all generable bodies together seek some universal end or some end that characterizes the universe as a whole (e.g., universal orderliness).^{27, 28}

- 1 We observe generable bodies that lack awareness typically seek their own flourishing.
- 2 What happens typically does not happen accidentally. So:
- 3 Generable bodies typically seeking their own flourishing does not happen accidentally. (from 1 and 2)
- 4 Generable bodies typically seeking their own flourishing, if it does not happen accidentally, occurs only because they are caused to do so by an agent that intends that this occur. So:
- 5 Generable bodies typically seeking their own flourishing occurs only because they are caused to do so by an agent that intends that this occur. (from 3 and 4)
- 6 If they are caused to do so by an agent that intends that this occur, then there is an agent that intends that this occur. So:
- 7 There is an agent that intends that this occur. (from 5 and 6)

A different way of putting the argument invokes the distinction, but also the similarity, between artifacts and natural objects. Artifacts are made by humans; their parts are made and organized so as to produce some end or other. They are made to do something, and insofar as they are well made, they do that thing. Call the feature of having parts that were made to be organized so as to produce specific results being operationally functional. Then the argument goes:

- 1 Artifacts are operationally functional things.
- 2 Natural objects are operationally functional things.
- 3 Operational functionality in artifacts is adequately explicable only by reference to intelligence.

- 4 If artifacts are operationally functional things, natural objects are operationally functional things, and operational functionality in artifacts is adequately explicable only by reference to (human) intelligence, then operational functionality in natural objects is adequately explained only by reference to intelligence. So:
- 5 Operational functionality in natural objects is adequately explained only by reference to intelligence. (from 1–4)
- 6 Operational functionality in natural objects is not caused by human intelligence.
- 7 What is caused by intelligence other than human is caused by non-human intelligence.
- 8 If operational functionality in natural objects is adequately explained only by reference to intelligence, and operational functionality in natural objects is not caused by human intelligence, and what is caused by intelligence other than human is caused by non-human intelligence, then operational functionality in natural objects is adequately explained only by reference to non-human intelligence.
- 9 Operational functionality in natural objects is adequately explained only by reference to non-human intelligence. (from 5–8)
- 10 If operational functionality in natural objects is adequately explained only by reference to non-human intelligence, then there is strong evidence that there is non-human intelligence.
- 11 There is strong evidence that there is non-human intelligence. (from 9, 10)

The conclusion is neither uninteresting (a newspaper editor convinced of its truth would put it in her headlines) nor as strong as Monothéism is true. Its religious relevance becomes obvious if one thinks what sorts of powers a being would have to have in order to cause operational functionality in natural objects.

The Hindu monotheist Ramanuja offers the following objections to the argument from design. Reacting to Indian versions of the argument from design he says:

(1) There is no proof to show that the earth, oceans, etc., although things produced, were created at one time by one creator. Nor can it be pleaded in favor of such a conclusion that all those things have one uniform character of being effects, and thus are analogous to one single jar, for we observe that various effects are distinguished by difference of time of production, and difference of producers . . . for experience does not exhibit to us one agent capable of producing everything.²⁹

That is, if we take our experience with artifacts as the clue to operational functionality in natural objects, often various humans cooperate in the production of an artifact, or make changes in it; the evidence cited by the argument from design suggests a committee as much as it does a single intelligence. A standard response is that one is justified in positing no more intelligences than is necessary to explain the data.

(2) Experience further teaches that earthen pots and similar things are produced by intelligent agents possessing material bodies, using implements, not endowed with the power of a Supreme Lord, limited in knowledge, and so on; the quality of being an effect therefore supplies a reason for inferring an intelligent agent of the kind described only.³⁰

That is, if we take our experience with artifacts as the clue to operational functionality in nature, its intelligent causes are embodied³¹ and possess limited intelligence and power.

(3) Consider the following point also. Does the Lord produce His effect with His body or apart from His body? Not the latter, for we do not observe causal agency on the part of any bodyless being; nor is the former alternative admissible, for in that case the Lord's body would be permanent or impermanent. The former would imply that something made up of parts is eternal; and if we say this we may as well admit that the world itself is eternal, and then there is no reason to infer a Lord. And the latter alternative is inadmissible because in that case there would be no cause of the body different from it (which would account for the origination of the body). Nor could the Lord Himself be assumed as the cause of the body, since a bodyless being cannot be assumed as the cause of a body. Nor could it be maintained that the Lord can be assumed to be "embodied" by means of some other body; for this leads us into a regress in infinitum.³²

Here, the reply is more complex. Suppose that God, like human artificers, must have a body in order for God to produce operational functionality in anything. Then God, able to produce operational functionality only through use of a body that is already is operationally functional, did not produce operational functionality in that body. God's own body, construed on the analogy with human artificers, has an operational functionality not produced by God. But then why not simply view all bodies as having some such intrinsic not-produced-by-God operational functionality? Ramanuja, then, concludes that the inference of a creative Lord which claims to be in agreement with observation is refuted by reasoning which itself is in agreement with observation, and we hence conclude that Scripture is the only source of knowledge with regard to a supreme soul that is the Lord of all and constitutes a highest Brahman.³³

David Hume, in his famous Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, offers criticisms similar to those of Ramanuja.³⁴ He views the argument from design as an inductive argument. The property relevant to the inductive inference is something like orderliness or behaving in specifiable, predictable ways always or for the most part. The things relevant to the inference are artifacts, like clocks, and natural objects, like apples or sheep. One is invited to infer from a sample class of which one has had experience (artifacts having been produced by an observable designer by an observable process) to a reference class of which one has had only partial relevant experience (one has observed natural objects though one has not observed them being caused to possess orderliness by a non-human intelligence). So the premises concern there being artifacts and natural objects, and both having orderliness. The conclusion is that natural objects are caused to have orderliness by a non-human intelligence.

The connecting premises point to the cause of orderliness in artifacts, namely human intelligence. The core idea is that inferring that orderliness in natural objects should be taken to have the same sort of cause – an intelligent mind – and obviously human minds do not cause orderliness in apples and goats.³⁵

Hume makes these objections among others:

- (a) there are other explanations of orderliness in natural objects than that they were designed – for example, natural objects might have a sort of intrinsic order, being by nature organisms or natural machines produced by natural processes;
- (b) we cannot in principle observe natural objects being caused to have orderliness by non-human intelligence nor can we in principle observe natural objects being caused to have orderliness by something else; observing an apple grow or a goat give birth are examples of orderliness, not explanations of orderliness of the sort disputers regarding the argument from design are concerned with;
- (c) there is no lawlike connection that we can know of between natural objects possessing orderliness and natural objects being caused to have orderliness by X, whether “X” is filled in by reference to intelligence, natural processes, or anything else, and legitimate inductive inferences ride the rails of natural laws.

The argument from design is, in effect, an argument to the best explanation – an argument that is intended to establish that, if we follow the sorts of procedures we typically follow in making probabilistic inference, we shall come to the conclusion that there is a designer. But there obviously are other explanations of operative functionality in natural objects – for example, that material particles evolved over a long period in such a manner as to produce such items. All that is required, the proposal is, is particles of the right sorts, laws, and time. This sort of explanation of operative functionality in natural objects is intended as well to explain there being human intelligence capable of causing operative functionality in artifacts. Thus most of the philosophically interesting issues raised by arguments from design have to do with how to decide which, among a group of explanations, is best, and how exactly to understand the relevant data and formulate the theories relevant to explaining them. This sort of issue comes up again in the final chapter on Faith and Reason.

The Teleological Argument

Another argument in the same family as the argument from design, but different in what it begins with – the intelligibility of nature or the possibility of science – and its straightforwardness as an argument to the best explanation – is the Teleological Argument. As construed here, it is a supplement to the Cosmological Argument. Here is one more objection to the Cosmological Argument: what the conclusion of the Cosmological Argument does (roughly) is to say that the universe of dependent things is caused by the act of an intelligent divine agent; it says that God, who might not have created anything, acted to create dependent things. But then God's action of creating might not have occurred. So we are left, not with a being that might not have existed but whose existence is really impossible to explain, but with an action that might not have occurred; what's the gain? – either way we stop our explanation arbitrarily. One way of construing the Teleological Argument – is not as an independent argument but rather as an answer to this objection to the Cosmological Argument.

The Teleological Argument is often stated as an independent argument. As stated here, it is a continuation of the Cosmological Argument, and offers an answer to the present objection to that argument. Again, some beginning definitions simplify the overall presentation.

D1 R is S's sufficient reason for doing A = S does A for reason R, there is no better reason for doing A than R, there is nothing better that

S might do than A, and S's doing A is right (note that being right does not entail being obligatory; if there is more than one right way of acting in a given circumstance, one's obligations in that circumstance are simply to act in one of those ways).

- D2 R is S's proper ultimate reason for doing A = R is S's sufficient reason for doing A, there is no true moral proposition from which R follows in any way that justifies R, R is true, and S knows that R is true (every proposition follows from other propositions – any proposition P follows from [(Q or P) and not-Q] – but not every proposition follows from others in a way that proves it true; if we cannot have some knowledge without proving it, we cannot prove anything).
- D3 S is completely rational in doing A = S has a proper ultimate reason for doing A.
- D4 E is an ultimate existence explanation = E explains the truth of a logically contingent existence proposition by reference to the truth of an existence proposition whose truth it is logically impossible to explain.

Statement of the Teleological Argument

- 1 If an ultimate existence explanation has a teleological explanation as an essential component, then the agent referred to in that teleological explanation is completely rational in acting as that explanation says she acts.
- 2 If an agent is completely rational in acting in a certain way, then there can be no further teleological explanation of her acting in that way.
- 3 If there can be no further teleological explanation of an agent's acting in a certain way, then unless the existence of that agent can be explained, there is nothing relevant that is left unexplained.
- 4 If God created the world, God was completely rational in doing so.

According (roughly) to the conclusion of the Cosmological Argument:

- 5 God created the world.

Hence, from 4 and 5:

- 6 God was completely rational in doing so.

Hence, from 2 and 6:

7 There can be no further explanation of God's creating the world.

But:

8 It is not possible to explain the existence of God.

Hence, from 3, 7, and 8:

9 There is nothing relevant that is left unexplained.

Hence the objection fails. One is not left with something explicable that is unexplained.

Conclusion

The combination of the Cosmological and Teleological Arguments considered above is one of the stronger versions of one sort at least of natural theology – the effort to present arguments that are plainly valid, have premises that are discernibly necessarily true or contingently true propositions, and infer to the existence of God. Even it, however, does not yield a proof that extends our knowledge.

Questions for reflection

- 1 What sort of proof extends our knowledge?
- 2 Explain the distinction between a necessarily true proposition and a contingently true proposition.
- 3 Is there a successful purely conceptual proof that God exists?
- 4 Does the existence of apparent design provide reason to think that God exists?
- 5 Discuss the inference from Something that might not have existed does exist and it is possible that its existence be explained to There is something that exists whose existence cannot be explained. If this inference is justified, how close does its conclusion get to monotheism?
- 6 Suppose there is no proof that God exists. Does anything else of philosophical interest follow?

Annotated reading

- Burrell, Donald (ed.) (1967) Cosmological Arguments, Garden City, NY: Anchor Books. An excellent collection of historical and recent discussions of the argument.
- Flew, Anthony (1966) God and Philosophy, London: Hutchinson. Philosophy of religion done on the presumption of atheism.
- Hick, John and McGill, Arthur (eds) (1967) The Many-faced Argument, New York: Macmillan. An excellent collection of historical and recent discussions of the ontological argument.
- Haldane, J. J. and Smart, J. J. C. (1996) Theism and Atheism, Oxford: Blackwell. An atheist and a Catholic theist argue their cases.
- Plantinga, Alvin (ed.) (1974) The Ontological Argument, New York: Harper and Row. An excellent collection of traditional, and some recent, treatments of the argument.
- Rowe, William (1975) The Cosmological Argument, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. Probably the best discussion of the argument.
- Swinburne, Richard (1979) The Existence of God, Oxford: Clarendon Press. Argues for the existence of God from a perspective in which the controversial idea of a priori simplicity is important.

CHAPTER 11

Monotheism and religious experience

Phenomenologically thick experiences

Experience as direct evidence

A principle of experiential evidence

Being evidence versus providing evidence

The evidential argument from religious experience

The principle of experiential evidence applied

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Monotheism and religious experience

Phenomenologically thick experiences

A phenomenological description of an experience is a description that tells us how the things appear to a person who has it. Consider these sentences, each of which uses the word “seems” in a different sense:

- 1 Kim seems less capable than she is. (Here, “seems” contrasts appearance to reality.)
- 2 It seems to Kim that she left the oven on. (Here, “seems” reports a shaky belief on Kim’s part.)
- 3 There seems to Kim to be a chair in front of her. (Here, “seems” expresses how Kim is “appeared to;” whether there is a chair there or not, it remains true that if things are as they perceptually appear to Kim, a chair is in front of her.)

So there are at least three senses of “seems” – a contrastive sense (in 1), an opinionative or belief-expressive sense (in 2), and an experiential and perceptual sense (in 3). Our concern is with the experiential, perceptual sense.

Suppose Kim is in a room that she knows was set up by some majors in psychology and physics. There seem to be twice as many chairs in the room as there are – half of the “chairs” are in fact holograms of chairs. Not having been in the room before, but knowing that half of what seem to be chairs are not, Kim nonetheless properly says:

- 4 It seems to me that there is a chair in front of me, though I have no idea whether I am seeing a chair or a hologram of a chair.

The “seems” here is experiential and perceptual; it is also phenomenological – it describes how things perceptually seem, whether they are that way or not. Using phenomenological descriptions, an atheist and a theist can agree that experiences occur in which it at least seems to the subject that she is perceiving a powerful, holy being¹ distinct from herself. They disagree over whether there is such a being that she perceives.

Thin description versus thick description

Members of monotheistic religious traditions report what they describe as experience of God. Sometimes the phenomenologies of these experiences are vanishingly thin, simply a matter of feeling forgiven or a sense that they ought to perform some action. Only if one reasonably already takes monotheism to be true, and even then only with various qualifications, might one also reasonably take these experiences actually to be experiences of God – at any rate reasonably in any sense in which it was not equally reasonable not so to take them.

Other experiences described as experiences of God are, as it were, phenomenologically thicker – the subjects report an awareness of a being of majestic power, profound holiness, overwhelming purity, and deep love. Such experiences are reported in various formal and informal mystical traditions in Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant contexts, in all of the Semitic monotheisms, and in Hindu monotheism. Similar reports are given by persons not associated with any mystical tradition, sometimes by persons not religious by any monotheistic standard. Sometimes these experiences are sought and sometimes they simply occur. An earlier chapter lists a few descriptions of such experiences.² The present question is whether the occurrence of these phenomenologically richer experiences provide any evidence that God exists. This question can be answered with any care only if we ask and answer some other questions first. Here is a series of relevant questions and answers. Throughout these questions and answers, but not elsewhere, “religious experience” will simply mean “experiences that, given their phenomenology, are, if reliable, experiences of God.”

Experience as direct evidence

Question 1: what sort of experience are we asking about?

The relevant experiences are subject/consciousness/object in structure; they involve a person having an experience which, providing that the experience is reliable, involves being aware of something or someone that is not dependent for its existence on being experienced. In that respect, such experiences resemble experiences of shrubs and worms (these being typically reliable, and shrubs and worms existing independent of one's experiencing them) or of ghosts (if experiences of ghosts were reliable, then ghosts would have experience-independent existence). They have the sort of content described above in the first part of our series of descriptions of religious experiences. They are also experiences in which the at least apparent object is not oneself, one's body, or one's mental states; they are (if reliable) experiences of something other than oneself or one's body or one's states – a being that exists distinct from and independent of oneself.

Question 2: can any experience be evidence for just any old claim?

Distinguish between direct evidence and indirect evidence. An experience is direct evidence for a claim that something exists only if it is true that the experience in question, if reliable, just is an experience of that thing. We take it that we have exactly that sort of experience of cats and computers. An experience is indirect evidence for the existence of something only if it is, if reliable, experience of something else, where if the something else exists, then the thing in question exists. Suppose that Ralph and Mabel are hosting Mabel's sloppy brother Jim, whom they know to be the only person in the world who eats peanut butter and mustard sandwiches. Arriving home, Ralph is hopeful that his brother-in-law may have ended his visit, but is chagrined to find on the kitchen table two peanut butter and mustard sandwiches waiting to be devoured; he infers that Jim is still around, and will soon be having a snack. Seeing the sandwiches provides direct evidence of their existence, and indirect evidence of Jim's continued presence. Our concern in this chapter will be with direct evidence only, and our concern with it focuses on the conditions under which experience provides direct evidence for the existence of something.

Not every experience can be direct evidence for the existence of just anything. Its at least seeming to Mary that there is tea in her cup, bread on her table, and music coming over the radio will not provide her with direct evidence that the Alps are still around, there are trolls, or that God exists. Mountains, trolls, and God are not among the things she even seems to experience. An experience is direct evidence only for what exists provided that experience is reliable – provided things are as that experience represents them as being. How an experience represents things as being is a function of its phenomenological content. Our concern here is with, and only with, experience as potential evidence for claims to the effect that things are as the experiences that are potential direct evidence for them represent things as being³ – with the cases of experiences and claims where the claims match up with the phenomenological content of the experiences. Experiences will not be direct evidence for any other claims.

A principle of experiential evidence

Question 3: how do we tell what an experience can be direct evidence for the existence of?

Suppose that Mary reports at least seeming to see a tiger in her garden; having this experience provides her with reason for concern or delight (depending on her views about having a tiger in her garden that she previously lacked). She has some evidence that There is a tiger in Mary's garden is true. There may not be: it is logically possible that she seems to see a tiger and there is none there. But even if tigers do not typically roam in her garden, her at least seeming to see a tiger in her garden provides her with hitherto absent evidence that there is one there now. The basic idea, then, is this: if Mary has an experience which, if reliable, is a matter of seeing a tiger in her garden, then she has experiential evidence that there is a tiger there. More formally:

- (P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, then S's having E gives S evidence that X exists.

Alternatively, suppose that Max has an experience, the phenomenological content of which justifies Max in saying If this experience is reliable, then I am experiencing something that fits description D, where D simply says what features it at least experientially seems to Max that something has. Then Max's experience is evidence that Something fitting D exists. If there ever is experiential evidence for anything that exists independent of our experience, (P) or some close cousin is true. What an experience can be evidence for is a function of what its phenomenology is; its phenomenology constrains what an experience can be evidence for. Further, at least seeming to see a tiger correctly describes only a very small range of possible phenomenologies or phenomenological contents. If an experience is correctly described as at least seeming to hear Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, at least seeming to smell coffee brewing, at least tasting like peppermint, at least seeming to see a large elephantly shaped thing, at least seeming to see a battleship, or the like, it will not have the proper phenomenological features to be direct evidence for at least seeming to see a tiger. In sum: an experience is evidence that there is an experience independently existing X only if having the experience is a matter of at least seeming to be aware of an X.

Question 4: can't such experiences go wrong in various ways?

Yes. If Mary is drinking a special Tiger Tea that always produces tiger-in-the-garden hallucinations, it will appear to her that there is a tiger in her garden whether there is one or not. This circumstance, let us say, will cancel the evidential force of the experience relative to there being a tiger in the garden. So we need to revise (P) via:

(P1) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled, then S's having E gives S evidence that X exists.

If Mary knows that the tea she has been drinking has this feature, she is justified in taking her evidence to have been cancelled.

Suppose that Mary has imbibed not the Tiger Tea that produces as-if-a-tiger-in-the-garden perceptions, but Sometime Tiger Tea that produces such perceptions on a more complex schedule. It never works if there is a tiger in the garden. But if there is no tiger in the garden then it causes as-if-tiger-in-the-garden perceptions a little more than half of the time. Once in a while, let us assume, there is a tiger in a garden. Sometime Tiger Tea produces tiger hallucinations exactly enough more than half so that the net result is that, taking into account genuine perceptions, half of the time if one drinks Sometime Tiger Tea one has an as-if-tiger-in-the-garden perception which corresponds to no tiger. Then the situation is that Mary, in having her as-if-tiger-in-the-garden experience, is exactly as likely as not to be seeing a real tiger, i.e., exactly as likely as not not to be seeing a real tiger. Then she has no more experiential evidence in favor of There is a tiger in the garden than there is against it. If she knows that her tea has this effect, she is justified in drawing no inference from her at least seeming to see a tiger to there being a tiger in the garden. Let us say that being in these circumstances has the effect of counterbalancing the evidential force of Mary's experience, and revise (P1) accordingly:

(P2) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled or counterbalanced, then S's having E gives S evidence that X exists.

If Mary knows that her experience of at least seeming to see a tiger is counterbalanced, then she is justified in not taking it to be evidence that there is a tiger that she sees.

Suppose that just prior to Mary's experience she undergoes a strange change regarding her perceptions that are, or seem to be, of a tiger – a change that others do not undergo. The change is this: she can never perceptually confirm There is not a tiger in the garden (or anywhere else). For whatever reason, she is perceptually incapable of noting the absence of tigers. Suppose, further, that it is true that:

- (E) If it is not possible for anyone to experientially disconfirm existential claim P, then it is not possible for anyone to experientially confirm P and that applied to Mary (E) yields this truth:

- (E-Mary) If it is not possible for Mary to experientially disconfirm existential claim P, then it is not possible for Mary to experientially confirm P.

Since, by hypothesis, Tigers exist is not experientially disconfirmable by Mary, it is, by (E-Mary), not experientially confirmable by Mary either. In such a circumstance, let us say that Mary's as-if-a-tiger-in-the-garden experience is compromised relative to There is a tiger in the garden. So we replace (P2) by:

- (P3) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised, then S's having E gives S evidence that X exists.

If Mary discovers that she has changed in the way described, and that (E) is true, she is justified in not taking her experience to be evidence of the presence of tigers.

Again, suppose someone discovers a proof that shows that there cannot be any tigers (the notion of a tiger contains a hidden inconsistency) or there cannot be any tigers in our world (what we know about initial physical conditions and laws of nature precludes the development of tigers). If our world cannot contain tigers, either because no world can or because of particular features of our world, then as-if-there-is-a-tiger experiences will all be unreliable. Under these conditions, let us say, Mary's as-if-there-is-a-tiger-in-the-garden experience is contradicted. Hence goodbye to (P3) and hello to:

- (P4) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted, then S's having E gives S evidence that X exists.

If Mary knows of the proof or the physical conditions and laws, she is justified in not taking her experience to be evidence that she sees a real tiger.

Yet again, suppose that someone proves, or gives us superb reason for believing, that there is a Tiger Deceiver who has complete power relative to the production of as-if-there-is-a-tiger perceptions and causes them only when there are no tigers. Thus, while we do not know whether there are tigers or not, we do know that all our experiences that seem to tell us that there are tigers are fakes. Under these conditions, let us say, Mary's as-if-there-is-a-tiger-in-the-garden experience is confuted. Thus (P4) yields pride of place to:

- (P5) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted, then S's having E gives S evidence that X exists.

If Mary has good reason for thinking that there is a Tiger Deceiver, she is justified in not taking her experience as evidence that she sees a tiger.

The notion of a Tiger Deceiver is one way of expressing the idea that what we call perceptions of tigers are universally illusory. This idea is distinct from the fact that it is logically possible that all perceptions of tigers are deceptive – that there never is a tiger when one seems to perceive one. That is a fact, just as it is a fact that it is logically possible that no perceptions of tigers are deceptive – that there always is a tiger that one sees when one seems to perceive one. The logical possibility of universal correctness, and the logical possibility of universal incorrectness, of tiger perceptions are not in dispute; neither idea is what the Tiger Deceiver idea concerns. That idea concerns the actual universal incorrectness of perceptions of tigers.

Finally, consider the neither lucid nor empty notion of a kind of experience. Let all sensory experiences be of the same kind, all introspective experiences be of the same kind, all moral experiences be of the same kind, all aesthetic experiences be of the same kind, presumably with various subkinds within each kind. Consider claims:

- (K) If it is logically possible that an experience E of kind K provide evidence in favor of existential proposition P, then it is logically possible that an experience E* of kind K provide evidence against P.

- (K1) If it is empirically possible that an experience E of kind K provide evidence in favor of existential proposition P, then it is empirically possible that an experience E* of kind K provide evidence against P.

The notion of empirical possibility does not really introduce a new notion of possibility; it simply amounts to logical consistency with natural laws and actual conditions. Suppose there were a natural law to the effect that (i) If an elephant is within ten yards of a peanut, the elephant cries. This, plus the truth of (ii) Here is an elephant within ten yards of a peanut, entails (iii) Here is an elephant that is crying. It is logically impossible that (i) and (ii) be true and (iii) be false. Since (i) is a natural law, and (ii) an empirical truth, (iii) is also an empirical truth.

Now suppose we have a natural law of the form (i*) If A then B does not obtain, and suppose that (ii*) A obtains is something that is always true in our world but is not a necessary truth – something like There is energy which might have been false, is true, and presumably is always true so long as our physical world exists at all. Then (iii*) B does not obtain follows; it is logically impossible that (i*) and (ii*) be true and (iii*) be false. The truth of not-(iii*) B obtains is logically inconsistent with the truth of (i*) – a natural law – and (ii*) – an always prevailing empirical condition. Then, we shall say, B's obtaining is empirically inconsistent.

Suppose that:

- (K) If it is logically possible that an experience E of kind K provide evidence in favor of existential proposition P, then it is logically possible that an experience E* of kind K provide evidence against P

is true. Suppose that it were logically impossible that there be experiential evidence against (T) There is a tiger in the garden. Then, if (K) is true, Mary could in principle have no sensory experience that provided evidence against (T) There is a tiger in the garden. Then, given (K), her as-if-a-tiger-is-in-the-garden experience would not provide evidence for that claim. If such conditions held, let us say that the evidential force of Mary's experience would be logically consumed.

Suppose that:

- (K1) If it is empirically possible that an experience E of kind K provide evidence in favor of existential proposition P, then it is empirically possible that an experience E* of kind K provide evidence against P.

It might be that while it was not logically impossible that sensory experience that provided evidence against (T) occur, certain features in our world might serve always to prevent the occurrence of experiential evidence against (T) – experiential evidence against (T) might be empirically impossible. Then, if (K1) is true, Mary could in fact have no sensory experience that provided evidence against (T) There is a tiger in the garden and then her as-if-a-tiger-is-in-the-garden experience would not provide evidence for that claim. Under that condition, let us say that her apparent experiential evidence was empirically consumed. (Here, as opposed to the discussion that led to (P3), everyone is in the state that we assumed there that only Mary was in.) Of course (P5) is now to be replaced by:

(P*) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, then S's having E is evidence that X exists.

There is something further to be noted about our application of (P*) here. Our interest is in experiential evidence regarding the existence of things other than ourselves and our states. So our application of (P*) will be to experiences that, if reliable, are experiences of things other than ourselves and our states – not because of any inherent limits in (P*) but because it is experiences that at least seem to be of things other than ourselves and our states that interest us here. Experiences that at least seem to be of ourselves and our states will come up in the next chapter.

Question 5: are all of these qualifications to (P) necessary?

Perhaps so, perhaps not; exactly what is appropriate to add to something like (P) is controversial. Some philosophers who have discussed a principle very similar to (P) have thought it too strong. If it is, that is no problem for our argument. Suppose religious experience is evidence if it passes the test of applying (P*) to it. Suppose also what is true is not (P*) but rather (P*)-minus-X, where X is what makes (P*) stronger than it should be. Any experience that passes the test of having (P*) applied to it and still being evidence will also pass the test of having (P*)-minus-X applied to it and still being evidence.⁴ It should be clear that any experience that was not disqualified as evidence by (P*) will also not be disqualified as evidence by any of the preceding principles. Our basic question, then, now becomes: assuming that (P*) is at least a sufficiently strong principle of experiential evidence – at least a powerful enough criterion to eliminate the mere pretenders among the candidates for experiences that provide evidence – are at least apparent experiences of God evidence that God exists?

Question 6: are all the necessary qualifications to (P) included in (P*)?

It is hard to tell; if additional qualifications are suggested, they can be looked at one by one. A proof that all of the necessary qualifications are included is hard to imagine – what, exactly, would such a proof look like? What one can do is to add all the qualifications one can think of that are defensible, even if this gives one more than is required.

Question 7: what about the claim that God is ineffable, or that religious experience is ineffable?

To say of something X that it is seriously and literally ineffable is to say that (I) For any concept C, C does not apply to X. Since the concept of ineffability is a concept, to make the claim that anything is seriously and literally ineffable is to assert something that is necessarily false. So neither God nor religious experience can be literally ineffable. It is possible to revise the thesis and say something like (Ia) For any concept C save the concept of ineffability, C does not apply to X. But X is ineffable entails X exists, so the concept of existence applies to X and thus (Ia) is false. One can then try (Ib) For any concept C save the concepts of ineffability and existence, C does not apply to X. But X exists and X has no properties is also necessarily false. One can then try (Ic) For any concept C save the concepts of ineffability, existence, and having properties, C does not apply to X. If the concept having properties applies to X, then so does the concept having only consistent properties, not being both prime and not prime, being either good or not, and so on. By the time one has finally reached a non-contradictory thesis, serious and literal ineffability has been left far behind. It is only serious and literal ineffability that would raise a problem for our argument.

Question 8: isn't the sort of criticism just made merely literary, superficial, intellectual cleverness without substance, and so worthless?

No. If one claims that nothing said in English can be true, what one says cannot be true. If one says that all sentences of more than four words are gibberish, if what one said were true, one would have said nothing. If one claims that the state of Washington is a prime number, one asserts that a concrete object is identical to an abstract object, that something spatially located is identical with something that cannot be spatially located, that something that might never have existed is identical to something which (if it exists at all) has logically necessary existence. All of these claims are discernibly intellectually disreputable in the light of what they entail. The same goes for the claim that something is ineffable.

The claim that something is ineffable, while it is (like all claims) made by the use of language, is not about language – it is about God, or religious experience, or whatever is said to be ineffable. Any claim that God, religious experience, or anything else is ineffable, as it turns out, is necessarily false. If one claims instead that God cannot be described in physical terms or that we cannot completely describe God,⁵ these claims are true. But they have nothing to do with ineffability.

Question 9: can't we always "explain away" any religious experience without any reference to God?⁶

Consider some person Tom and some experience E that Tom has. To give a social science explanation of Tom's having E is to refer to some science phenomenon SSP – some institution, practice, community membership, phobia, desire, economic status, political role or perspective, social standing, unconscious motivations, or whatever – and to claim that Tom's having SSP is the cause of Tom's experience E. Suppose some such explanation is true. Does it disqualify E from being reliable? Suppose E is a conceptual experience – Tom's belief that social science is not simply a superstition that unscrupulous academics have developed in order to bilk money from students and government agencies. Is that conceptual experience of Tom's rendered unreliable, or at least somehow evidentially neutralized, by its being social science explicable? Suppose instead Tom's experience is that of appreciating the love of his family, respecting the environment, hoping studying hard will enable him to pass his social science course, or being shocked at the number of conspiracy theories people accept. If there are social science explanations, as there seem to be, these experiences are going to be explained by them in whatever sense social science explanations do explain anything. But their being social science explicable in no way discredits the evidential value of such experiences, if they have any in the first place. After all, the development of the social sciences themselves, their procedures of inquiry and standards of research and methods of theory testing are all themselves social science explicable. If being social science renders unreliable what is explained, social science itself is a crock.

Two things are necessary for what might be called social science debunking. The first is that the thing – the experience, belief, practice, or whatever – has been shown to be unreliable, false, unsuccessful, or otherwise defective. Then some social science explanation is appealed to in order to explain how anybody could accept an unreliable experience, a false belief, an unsuccessful practice. But all of the critical intellectual work involved in the debunking has already been done by the time social science is appealed to. Of course what typically happens is that opponents of a view simply offer the social science explanation without bothering about offering actual arguments and evidence against what they oppose, and then claim to have debunked the view they dislike, hoping that no one will notice that their own view is also social science explicable and that they haven't actually refuted anything.

Question 10: aren't there crucial differences between, say, sensory experience and religious experience?

There certainly are differences. They are crucial for some matters, and not crucial for others. Let such experiences as seeing that identity is transitive, recognizing that no contradiction can be true, discerning that arguments of the form (P or Q, and not-Q; therefore P) are valid but arguments of the form (P or Q, and Q; therefore P) are invalid be conceptual experiences. There are crucial differences between sensory experiences and conceptual experiences; that fact casts no aspersions on either sort of experience and gives no reason to suppose that either is evidentially suspect.

Suppose that Tara and Todd sit beside one another at morning worship. Tara and Todd both at least appear to see a stained-glass window and Tara has a religious experience whereas Todd does not. If Tara were to seem to see a window and Todd were not, given that both are sighted and looking in the same place, either Tara is window-hallucinating or Todd is window-blind. But Todd's not having a religious experience does not call into question Tara's having one, nor does it raise doubts about the religious experience that Tara has. This difference sometimes is put by saying that sensory experience is public in a way that religious experience is not. Further, if one wants to see the window, simple procedures will allow this, whereas experiences of God are not producible by following a procedure. Sensory experiences typically are controllable where religious experiences are not. Further still, if one sees the window, one can predict that if one reaches out, one will touch it; if one raps it gently, one will hear a sound; if one tastes it, one will get a cold, smooth sensation; were one to strike it sharply with a hammer, it would break, and so on. Sensory experiences typically ground predictions and are testable by comparison with experiences from other sensory modalities. Typically, religious experiences do not ground predictions nor do there seem to be multiple religious modalities.⁷

These differences are crucial only if they underlie this difference: it is possible to cross-check sensory experiences but it is not possible to crosscheck religious experiences. Since this is not so, these differences are not crucial relative to the question of whether religious experience provides evidence that God exists.

Question 11: how can one check religious experiences?

In exactly the ways one might expect. First, any experience that satisfies (P*) is evidence by virtue of that fact. There isn't any point in checking, say, one sensory experience against another unless each such experience has some presumptive evidential force. If it looks like my computer screen has turned solid gold, there is no point in checking unless my looking again has some evidential punch all on its own; but then the first look has evidential punch too. If there isn't any conflict among one's sensory experiences, as there very often is not, then comparison will have no negative results regarding their reliability. The same typically holds for at least apparent experiences of God. Second, one appeals to other things one knows or reasonably believes in sorting out what experiential conflicts one finds in sensory experience. If an experience is reliable only if something is false that we have good reason to believe, its reliability is properly questioned. The same holds for religious experiences. Third, if religious experiences occur, as they do, in various cultures, at various times, to people in various sorts of social, economic, political, and psychological situations, that is all to the good – it broadens the base of possible comparison of experience with experience, removes concern that religious experience is somehow tied to one culture or another, and the like.

Being evidence versus providing evidence

If (P*) is true, any experience not disqualified by it is evidence. It does not follow that any such experience is taken as evidence by one. Perhaps no one even considers whether the experience is evidence or takes it to be such; perhaps everyone falsely believes that it is not evidence. Being evidence is a necessary but not sufficient condition for providing evidence. What else is required? One obvious thing is this: in order for an experience to provide evidence to one, one must believe it to be evidence, and it must be evidence. But what else?

An honorable tradition tells us this. It is logically possible that there is a Terrible Tiger Deceiver who produces as-if-there-is-a-tiger experiences only when there is not a tiger; therefore whether there are tigers or not, all of our as-if-there-is-a-tiger experiences are unreliable. If Mary has no reason to think the Terrible Tiger Deceiver hypothesis false, Mary cannot properly claim to have experiential evidence that there is a tiger in the garden. Since Mary will have a hard time refuting that hypothesis, it seems that Mary's experience provides her no tiger-favoring evidence.

Another, and opposite, perspective says that Mary only need (nonculpably) to have no reason to think that the Terrible Tiger hypothesis is true. The notion of non-culpably having no reason is complex, but we need here only a brief characterization. If a matter is of enough importance, and there are considerations relative to whether an experience is reliable, and these considerations are accessible, then one basing a belief on the evidence that his experience seems to provide should see if it does so in the light of those considerations. If he does not do so, his belief is arguably unreasonable; he has not checked out what he should. The various notions involved here – matter of enough importance, relevant considerations, accessibility – are hardly lucid. For our purposes, only two things need be noted: (i) since our concern is centrally with whether religious experiences are evidence, and so can provide evidence, for religious belief, we need not enter deeply into a discussion as to exactly when a particular person is reasonable in accepting them as evidence, and (ii) if an experience does not run afoul of any of the canceling factors mentioned in our principle of experiential evidence, or there isn't any good reason to think that it does, that greatly reduces the plausibility of claiming that one who takes them to provide evidence is unreasonable in virtue of doing so.

Since Mary will have a hard time finding much of substance to say on behalf of the Terrible Tiger hypothesis – there being no reason to think it true – it seems that her as-if-there-is-a-tiger experience is evidentially in order.

It is easy to reason: the former standard seems higher and safer, so perhaps it is the one to accept. This is deceptive. The solid philosophical core of the honorable tradition is the truth of these propositions:

(LP1) It is logically possible that, for any person S and sensory experience E that S has, E is unreliable.

It is always logically possible that, say, one seems to see a glass and there is no glass there.

(LP2) It is logically possible that, for every person S and sensory experience E that S has, E is unreliable.

While (LP2) does not follow from (LP1), both are true (indeed, necessarily true).

But consider these claims:

(LP3) It is logically possible that, for any person S and sensory experience E that S has, E is reliable.

It is always logically possible that, say, one seems to see a glass and there is a glass there.

(LP4) It is logically possible that, for every person S and sensory experience E that S has, E is reliable.

While (LP4) does not follow from (LP3), both are true (indeed, necessarily true). So far as logical possibilities go, each of these four is as much a possibility as any other. No amount of reflection on these possibilities will tell us whether Mary's experience is tiger-favoring evidence. So the truth of (LP1) and (LP2) provides no support for its claims about what Mary must know if her experience is evidentially in order.

To the Terrible Tiger Deceiver hypothesis there corresponds the Terrific Tiger Promoter hypothesis that tells us of a being who produces as-if-there-is-a-tiger experiences only when there is a tiger, so that all as-if-there-is-a-tiger experiences are reliable. Mary has just as much reason to accept the Terrific Tiger Promoter hypothesis as she has to embrace the Terrible Tiger Deceiver hypothesis, namely none whatever. In sum, taken as a way of highlighting the truth of (LP1) and (LP2), the Terrible Tiger hypothesis simply reduces to (LP1) and (LP2), which along with (LP3) and (LP4) are both true and of no help in deciding when Mary's experience provides her with evidence. Taken as a literal thesis about what there is, it is competitive to (for example) the Terrific Tiger Promoter hypothesis, and there is no reason at all to think it, or its competitor, true. Further, both are irrelevant to what Mary must know or believe in order for her experience to be evidence.

If what the honorable tradition proposes as decisive is in fact irrelevant, there remains the other suggestion, which is the one pursued here. Whatever the correct principle of experiential evidence is, in order for Mary's experience to provide her with evidence, it must be evidence, she must take it as such, and she must (non-culpably) have no reason to think that what the correct principle of experiential evidence says would render her experience non-evidential actually does so. In terms of the principle of experiential (P*), she must (non-culpably) have no reason to think that her experience is canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed. Then her experience provides evidence that there is a tiger in the garden. Thus:

(P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and S (non-culpably) has no reason to think that E is canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, and S takes E as evidence that X exists, then in having E, S has evidence that X exists.

The evidential argument from religious experience

One might argue in this manner: religious experiences are at least apparently experiences of God; the best explanation of the occurrence of these experiences is that God causes them; so it is more reasonable than not to believe that God causes them; if God causes them, then God exists; so it is more reasonable than not to believe that God exists. This is an inferential argument from religious experience. It is compatible with the argument offered here that this inferential argument succeeds. But the argument here is not an inferential argument from religious experience.

An evidential argument from religious experience has a different shape. It goes like this: experiences occur which at least seem to be experiences of God; if these satisfy a correct principle of experiential evidence, they are reasonably taken to be reliable; they do satisfy a correct principle of experiential evidence; they are hence reasonably taken to be reliable; if they are reasonably taken to be reliable, then they provide evidence that God exists; hence they provide evidence that God exists. The argument presented here is an evidential argument from religious experience, not an inferential argument from religious experience.⁸

Here is a basic version of the evidential argument from religious experience:

- 1 Experiences occur which are a matter of their subjects at least seeming to experience God.
- 2 If the subjects of experiences of this sort (non-culpably) have no reason to think that these experiences are canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, then their occurrence gives them evidence that God exists.
- 3 The subjects of experiences of this sort typically have no reason to think that these experiences are canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed. Hence:
- 4 These experiences give them evidence that God exists, (from 1–3)

The principle of experiential evidence applied

The first premise is an empirical truth. The argument of course also requires that premise 2 is true. Here is an argument for that premise. Premise 2 says that religious experience is not disqualified by any of the considerations included in:

(P*) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and S (non-culpably) has no reason to think that E is canceled or counter-balanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, then S's having E is evidence that X exists.

Suppose, then, that Mary has what is an at least apparent experience of God. The first two relevant terms in (P*) are defined, relative to an experience providing evidence, as follows:

- 1 Mary's experience is canceled as evidence if she has reason to think that she would seem to experience God whether or not God exists.

- 2 Mary's experience is counterbalanced as evidence if she has reason to believe that it is just as likely that she seem to experience God if God does not exist as it is if God does exist.

Suppose, then, that Mary has a religious experience in which she at least appears to encounter a majestic, holy, powerful, loving being – an experience similar to those described earlier as central to monotheistic traditions. It is very likely that Mary will have no reason whatever to think that she would seem to experience this being even if it did not exist. This is particularly likely if she has not been taking drugs that might cause such an experience. If (as was argued earlier) social science explanations do not typically “explain away” religious experience, Mary's experiential evidence is not canceled. She is also unlikely to have any reason to think that it is just as likely that she have the experience if the being in question does not exist as it is that she have it if that being does exist. In the light of the truth of the basic idea of our principle of experiential evidence – that one's at least seeming to experience X is evidence that X exists unless we have some good reason to think otherwise, one claiming that Mary's experience is counterbalanced owes us some particular reason for thinking so. An argument that God does not exist, even if it had some force, would provide evidence one way; this would not entail that Mary's experience did not provide evidence the other way. It is hard to make a good case that Mary's experience, and all others like it, suffer the fate of being counterbalanced.

The remaining relevant terms from (P*) are defined in this manner:

- 3 Mary's experience is compromised as evidence if Mary has reason to believe that it is not logically possible that God exists be experientially disconfirmed.
- 4 Mary's experience is contradicted as evidence if Mary has reason to believe that it is logically impossible that God exist, or to believe that the existence of the initial physical conditions we have reason to think obtain plus the laws of nature are incompatible with God existing.
- 5 Mary's experience is confuted as evidence if Mary has reason to believe that there is a being that is not God but produces what appear to be experiences of God.
- 6 Mary's experience is logically or in fact consumed as evidence if it is logically impossible, or inconsistent with the existence of the initial physical conditions we have reason to think obtain, plus the laws of nature, that there be experiences of the same kind as Mary's experience which provide evidence against God exists.

Condition 4 will apply only if Mary has reason to think that any concept of God adequate to the monotheistic traditions is logically inconsistent or if there being a world with the physical characteristics of our world is logically inconsistent with God existing. There seem to be no good reasons to think either of these things.

Condition 5 will raise a problem for Mary's experience being reliable only if it is logically or empirically impossible that there be experiential evidence against the claim that God exists. Suppose, then, as is logically possible and consistent with what we know about initial conditions and laws of nature, that these two sorts of experience were to occur.

Sort 1: everyone, upon dying, were to go to a place where everyone was exquisitely happy, civilized, and glad to be alive, or to a place where everyone was devastatingly unhappy, crude and violent, and devoutly wishing for their annihilation; those in the happy habitat are without exception those who have opposed the idea of God, been atheists or at least agnostics, been hostile to monotheism of any kind, and enjoyed nothing so much as committing blasphemy; those in the miserable habitat are without exception those who have, as they thought, worshipped and served God, been sincere monotheists, prayed, sung hymns, and tried to live lives in accord with monotheistic morality; societies for psychical research communicate with both habitats and receive convincing evidence that this is indeed how things are in the after-life; scientists working in the happy habitat discover that there are fundamental laws of nature that will keep those in the happy habitat there, and those in the miserable habitat there, for ever.

Sort 2: most apparent experiences of a non-human intelligence were of a powerful being who enjoys wickedness, encourages rape and murder and torture. Excruciating suffering accompanies all such experiences and those who have them become exceedingly violent and dangerous, and the only remaining religious experiences are those in which the subjects are first given experiences with phenomenologies like those of monotheistic experiences and then followed by phenomenologies in which it is explained that monotheistic experiences were given to religious fools to deceive them.

Were experiences of Sort 1 to occur, we would have experiential evidence against the existence of God, perhaps of the same kind as are Mary's own experience and possibly not. (Given the looseness of the notion of a kind of experience, one could dispute the claim that they would be of the same kind. If Sort 1 experiences are not of the same kind as Mary's at least apparent experience of God, it may also be the case that the requirement that they be of the same kind is too unclear to give any force to the idea that relevant possibly confirming and possibly disconfirming experience be of the same kind.) Were experiences of Sort 2 to occur, we would have experiences more clearly of the same kind as Mary's – experiences at least apparently of a powerful, overwhelming non-human being who was, not holy and loving, but wicked and hateful; these experiences would be experiential evidence against God exists. It is logically possible, and in fact possible, that such experiences occur. So it is not logically, or in fact, impossible that there be experiential evidence against God's existence, both not of the same sort as Mary's and of that sort. Mary is likely to have no reason to think that such experiences are logically impossible, and she would be mistaken to think that they were. So Conditions 3 and 6 raise no barrier to Mary's experience being evidence. Nor is Mary likely to have any reason to think that her experience is caused by someone or something other than God. So Condition 5 raises no difficulties. For many, probably most, experiences like Mary's, (P*) is indeed satisfied. Hence premise 2 is true.

Evidence only for the experiential subjects?

Suppose one learns that explorers in northern Minnesota have discovered thick-furred black squirrels, hitherto thought to inhabit only the East with their center on the Princeton University campus, that thrive on pine cones and fish as well as nuts and weigh as much as forty pounds. The explorers' squirrel-spotting and squirrel-weighing experiences satisfy (P*), and so are evidence for there being the squirrel giants. They also satisfy (P) and so provide the explorers with evidence for their conclusions. There is nothing to prevent one from learning from all this that northern Minnesota is blessed with giant black squirrels without oneself making a trip there. Similarly, if religious experiences occur that satisfy (P*), and so are evidence, and satisfy (P) relative to their subjects who accept the experiences as evidence, they provide evidence for the claim that God exists. There is no reason why one cannot learn of the occurrence of such experiences, consider (P*) and (P) relative to one's own situation, and conclude that these experience, had by others, provide one with evidence that God exists. Indeed, there would be nothing unreasonable in taking them to be such evidence, even if their subjects did not, provided one had no reason to think that those subjects were anything other than mistaken in whatever reasons they might have for not accepting their own experiences as evidence that God exists.⁹

Questions for reflection

- 1 Explain what is meant by a “phenomenological description” and why they are useful in the philosophy of religion.
- 2 What is the difference between an experience providing direct evidence for a claim that something exists and an experience providing indirect evidence for a claim that something exists? Give examples.
- 3 What is a principle of experiential evidence? What considerations are relevant when one constructs one?
- 4 State and assess a direct argument from at least apparent experience of God to God’s existence.
- 5 What sorts of experiences can be shown not to be evidence by applying a principle of experiential evidence to them?
- 6 Can one person’s religious experience provide evidence for another person?

Annotated reading

Alston, William (1991) Perceiving God, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press. Argues that the practice of belief-formation within which Christians claim to experience God is reliable; considers a host of epistemological views.

Broad, C. D. (1953) Religion, Philosophy, and Psychological Research, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul. Contains a standard, rather favorable discussion of religious experience by an agnostic.

Davis, Carolyn Franks (1989) The Evidential Force of Religious Experience, Oxford: Clarendon Press. Argues that religious experience provides evidence for God’s existence. Strength is its detailed discussion of social science theories; supposes that there is only one kind of religious experience.

Hardy, Alister (1979) The Spiritual Nature of Man: A Study of Contemporary Religious Experience, Oxford: Clarendon Press. Presents reports of religious experiences by “ordinary people.”

Martin, C. B. (1989) Religious Experience, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press. Argues that religious experience does not provide evidence that God exists.

Rowe, W. L. (1982) “Religious experience and the principle of credulity,” International Journal for the Philosophy of Religion 13, pp. 85–92. Argues that religious experience does not provide evidence for religious belief.

Yandell, Keith E. (1993) The Epistemology of Religious Experience, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. Full-dress presentation of the argument of this chapter.

PART IV

Arguments
concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions

CHAPTER 12

Arguments concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions (1)

Appeals to argument and appeals to experience

Advaita Vedanta

Jainism and Buddhism on persons

Identity

Personal identity

Bundle theory

Copiers and annihilators

Substance theory

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Arguments concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions (1)

Appeals to argument and appeals to experience

Three views are relevant here: Advaita Vedanta's claim that (i) only Brahman without qualities exists, Jainism's contention that (ii) persons are inherently immortal and independently existing beings, and the typical Buddhist view that (iii) persons are composite entities, made up of other things that are not persons and that comprise the basic constituents of the universe. These are obviously logically incompatible claims; all could be false, but not more than one could be true. If only qualityless Brahman exists, persons and nonperson constituents of persons, which have qualities if they exist, do not exist – if (i) is true, (ii) and (iii) are false. If persons are not composed of nonperson constituents, then they have properties, and so are not identical to Brahman – if (ii) is true, then (i) and (iii) are false. If persons are made up of nonperson constituents, then these constituents have properties and persons are composite and so dependent – if (iii) is true, then (i) and (ii) are false.

These claims are defended and attacked by appeal to argument and appeal to experience. By appeal to argument is meant use of arguments whose premises do not contain reports of nonconceptual experiences people have or are alleged to have had; by appeal to experience is meant use of arguments that do contain reports of nonconceptual experiences people have, or are alleged to have had, or simple appeal to those reports. A conceptual experience is one in which, without appeal to sensory or introspective experience, one comes to see the meaning, and perhaps the truth value, of some proposition; seeing that nothing can have incompatible properties, noticing that it cannot be known that no one knows anything, seeing if there are tables then there are physical objects, are examples of conceptual experiences. Highly undervalued, and often ignored, such experiences are experiences without whose possession ordinary life, let alone philosophy, would be impossible. Yet empiricists have officially treated them as trivial. The present chapter will be concerned with appeal to argument; the next chapter will deal with appeal to experience.

Advaita Vedanta

It looks as if Advaita wants to hold all of a set of logically inconsistent theses. In particular, it begins with the claim that something exists but altogether lacks properties, and that something that altogether lacks properties can be identical to a variety of things that have properties and are distinct from one another. The dodge that nirguna Brahman is ineffable has its own enormous problems, and in any case if we have no idea what properties Brahman has, and can form no concept of them, how could we possibly know that Brahman is qualityless or with what Brahman was or was not identical?

Ramanuja,¹ for example, held that it was contradictory to hold that There is an X such that for any property P, X lacks P. (Or, if existence itself is a property, There is an X such that for any property P other than existence, X lacks P.) Thus to claim that Brahman, or anything else, is qualityless is to claim that it exists and deny an entailment of that very claim. Hence Advaita Vedanta metaphysics is not even possibly true. Ramanuja's critique seems decisive, and there is no point in lingering over logical impossibilities.

Jainism and Buddhism on persons

The philosophical context: three exclusive but non-exhaustive alternatives²

Three alternatives regarding the nature of mind and body are idealism, materialism, and dualism. Idealism holds that having a mental property is kind-defining relative to the only kind of substances there are; materialism gives that status to having a physical property; dualism holds that having a mental property and having a physical property are kind-defining relative to two distinct kinds of substances.³ Thus each of these views is substantival and essentialist: each holds that there are substances that belong to a kind and hence have essences. Among mind-body dualists, some suppose minds or souls to exist without depending on anything else whatever, and so as inherently immortal; others take souls to exist dependent upon God, and as immortal only in the sense that God alone could annihilate them by simply ceasing to cause them to exist. Jainism embraces the former, more radical, dualism on which it is impossible that a soul cease to exist; Christianity, insofar as it accepts dualism, holds to the less radical version.

Property dualism versus substance dualism

Jain dualism is one version of mind–body dualism. Insofar as religious traditions are dualistic concerning mind and body, they tend to a dualism of substances, not merely a dualism of properties. Property dualism concerning mental and physical properties holds that being a mental property defines one kind of property and being a physical property defines another kind of property, and it is logically impossible that any property belong to both kinds. A property Q is a mental property if and only if X has Q entails X is self-conscious. Not every non-mental property is a physical property; being prime is not a physical property, nor is having only consistent properties. Without pretense of precision, let us refer to such properties as “abstract properties” and then suggest that property Q^* is a physical property, if and only if Q^* is neither mental nor abstract. There are more concrete definitions of being a physical property; for example, one can say that Q^* is a physical property if and only if X has Q^* entails X is spatially located or X is a property referred to by some predicative term used in some contemporary theory in natural science or some similar successor. But the more concrete examples raise problems; it is not clear that there is any univocal sense in which both chairs and elementary particles are “spatially located” and “similar” in “similar successor” means “physicalistic” (or something less clear).⁴

Philosophical timidity will, in the current academic climate, suggest to even the most convinced property dualist, of which there are many, that they should not go further and embrace substance dualism. A substance dualist concerning mind and body holds that not only are being mental and being physical definitive of different kinds of properties, but each is a kind-defining property relative to a sort of substance – being mental constitutes one kind or essence and being physical constitutes another kind or essence, it being logically impossible that any one substance belong to both kinds. Something is a substance if and only if it has properties, is not itself merely a bundle of properties, and (if it is temporal) can remain the same over time and through change of non-essential properties. For a substance dualist, persons are mental substances. Typically, human beings are persons embodied in genetically homo sapiens bodies.

Substance dualism, and its associated view of persons, has a highly distinguished history. Plato, Augustine, Anselm, Descartes, Samuel Clarke, and Thomas Reid all held it. It also has some distinguished contemporary advocates.⁵ Its popularity currently is at low tide, this arguably (if a pun be allowed) being more a matter of fashion than of substance.

Identity

Symmetry and transitivity of identity

The proposition A is identical to B entails the proposition B is identical to A. The proposition A is identical to B and B is identical to C entails the proposition A is identical to C. These two simple facts about identity are expressed by logicians by saying that identity is reflexive and transitive. Whether A, B, and C are wombats, kumquats, tuxedos, numbers, angels, or galaxies, identity among them is reflexive and transitory. To deny this is to deny that there is any such thing as identity as applied to them, which is the same as denying that there are any such things.

Numerical versus qualitative identity

In considering competing views of persons, and of personal identity, it is crucial to keep firmly in mind the distinction between numerical identity and the quite different matter of qualitative (so-called) identity or resemblance. Suppose Tim has a penny in each hand, each minted in Philadelphia in 1998, both bright and unscratched. He names the one in his left hand "Cop" and the one in his right hand "Per." Cupping his hands together, he shakes the pennies and then again grasps one in one hand and one in the other. Neither he nor we were able to keep track of either penny during the shaking. In these simple circumstances, we know that Cop is still in Tim's left hand or else Cop is now in Tim's right hand, and that either Per is still in Tim's right hand or else Per is now in Tim's left hand. But we do not know which.

This simple example illustrates various important concepts. Both Cop and Per retain numerical identity over time. Since we do not know which penny Cop is, Cop's having numerical identity over time is a fact about it independent of our knowledge of it. Cop and Per are qualitatively identical; that is why we cannot, at the end of the shaking, tell which penny is which. These basic notions can be formally characterized as follows:

Full Qualitative Identity: X is fully qualitatively identical to Y if and only if for any quality Q, X has Q if and only if Y has Q (here “Q” ranges over spatial and temporal qualities as well as other qualities).

Nearly Full Qualitative Identity: X is nearly fully qualitatively identical to Y if and only if for any quality Q, if Q is not a spatial or a temporal quality, X has Q if and only if Y has Q (here “Q” does not range over temporal or spatial qualities).

The pennies Cop and Per are not fully qualitatively identical; they occupy different places. But they are nearly fully qualitatively identical, hence our inability to tell one from the other after they are shaken.⁶

Any substance is self-identical, identical to itself at each moment of its existence; identity in this sense is numerical identity. If substance X exists at time T1 and continues to exist at the next moment T2, then the X that exists at T2 is identical to the X that existed at T1; here, too, identity is numerical identity.

Numerical identity, strictly speaking, is identity; qualitative identity is a matter, not of identity, but of resemblance. For a dualist, personal identity is numerical identity of a person – a self-conscious substance: identity to itself at a time, and to its continually existing self over each of various times.⁷

Temporal endurance of a simple substance is sufficient for its continuing numerical identity. For a simple substance X to endure from T through T* is for it to be the case that at each time from T through T*, and for any property Q such that Q is essential to X, X has Q at each moment from T through T*. The *closest thing to*⁸ temporal endurance of a simple substance X from T through T* is for a certain sort of series of things to exist – a series that contains X at T (and then X ceases to exist), and at each moment from T1 through T* one or another substance Y that is nearly fully qualitatively identical to X at T exists. Such a series will exist if either (i) at each moment from T through T*, a different simple substance exists that is nearly fully qualitatively identical to each other in the series, or (ii) at each moment after T through T*, there is one simple substance that is nearly fully qualitatively identical to X, or (iii) something between (i) and (ii).⁹ But that (i) be satisfied is not sufficient for there being a single simple substance from T through T*. The same holds for (ii) and (iii). If the closest thing to temporal endurance of a simple substance enduring from T through T* is not sufficient for there being a single substance that exists from T through T*, then those conditions being satisfied is not the same as there being a simple substance that endures from T through T*.

Personal identity

General criteria for theories of personal identity

A theory of personal identity should consist of elements, none of which is itself self-contradictory, which are also logically consistent with one another, each of which coheres with the others in such a way as to yield a plausible account of what it is to be a person, which account is compatible with and explanatory of the things we know about persons.

An exhaustive and exclusive disjunction

These are two basic sorts of views held regarding persons: persons are simple or complex. If they are simple, they are substances.¹⁰ If they are complex, they are composed of substances or qualities or states or whatever. If they are substances, they are either mental or physical. If they are not substances, they are complex and composed of mental and/or physical qualities or states or whatever. It is logically impossible that both views be true. There are various substantival views about persons other than the Jain view (for example, that persons are material substances, that persons are mental substances whose essence differs from that proposed by Jainism). There are other non-substantival views about persons other than the Theravada view (for example, that rather than states or qualities, it is events, processes, or the like that make up persons).¹¹ But the claims Persons are simple substances, essential to Jainism, and Persons are not simple substances, essential to Buddhism, are exhaustive as well as exclusive. Thus one or the other is true, and the remaining view is false. Can we tell which is true?

Bundle theory

A non-substantival view of persons

A complexity account of persons holds that (i) a person may be made of elements that are not themselves persons, (ii) these elements, whatever they are, exist only momentarily, and (iii) what makes a bundle of elements that comprises a person at one time (part of) the same person as another bundle at a later time is some relation R that holds between the bundles. There is a constraint on what relation R can be. It cannot be numerical identity over time, since R is supposed to explain – to state the sufficient conditions for – numerical identity of persons over time.

The idea, then, is that a person at a time is a bundle B1 of momentary apersonal elements, that a person at another time is another bundle B2 of momentary elements. No element in one bundle can be identical to an element in another bundle. Over time, a person is a series of bundles. Our concern here is with the structure of this type of view, not with its content. There are different accounts of what the alleged elements are that make up a person at a time; they may be viewed as physical, as mental, or as some of each. There are different notions of what relation R allegedly relates bundles over time into one person: perfect or imperfect resemblance, temporal continuity, memory, causality, a combination of these, and so on. If the critique offered here is correct, then questions of content and relationship become moot; no such view can succeed if the critique is correct. One thing the Complexity View cannot allow is that a person is a substance – a simple thing that endures over time. It is precisely that substantival view (whether the substance be viewed as mental or as physical) that the Complexity View is intended to supersede. We will consider arguments for the view that persons are bundles in the next chapter in connection with appeals to experience; these have been historically the most influential arguments for the view. In this chapter, we will consider arguments against the view.

Jainism, Buddhism, and the justice requirement

One can put the Buddhist view this way. There are persons(1) and persons(2):

- 1 Tom is a person(1) if and only if Tom is a one-or-more-membered bundle of conscious states at time T and Tom exists at no time other than T.
- 2 Tom* is a person(2) if and only if Tom* is a more-than-one-membered series of persons(1).

Let the notion of a constituent be defined as follows: A is a constituent of B if and only if (i) B is composite or has parts, and (ii) A is a part of B. Given the Buddhist account of person(2), a person(2) can have a constituent. Further, since even momentary bundles can be complex, persons(1) can have constituents.¹² On the Jain account of persons, persons can have no constituents. At a time, on the Buddhist account, a person simply is a bundle of conscious states. This is all there is to any person – say, Amy – at a given time.

For Amy to perform some action at time T is for the bundle – the person(1) – that is Amy at time T to act. The karmic effects of Amy’s action at T do not all occur at T; it is false that the effects that Buddhist doctrine regards as karmic all occur then and if they did all occur at T then, contrary to Buddhist doctrine, karmic effects would not lead to reincarnation. Karmic credit or debit would be instantaneously paid in or out. After T, there is no such person(1) that is identical to Amy-at-T. Hence no effects shall accrue to that person(1). The Buddhist idea is that the justice requirement be met as follows: a person(1) other than Amy-at-T will receive the relevant karmic effects, and this person(1) must be a part of the person(2) to which Amy-at-T belongs. On a Jain account, the justice requirement is fulfilled only if the same self-conscious substance as performed the deed receives the consequences.

An external critique of the view that persons are bundles¹³

There are external criticisms of Buddhist-type views – criticisms that appeal to claims that are not part of a Buddhist-type account of persons or otherwise elements in a Buddhist perspective. There is nothing intrinsically philosophically problematic in the notion of such a critique or in various of its instances. If I forward the hypothesis that Mahavira was a Buddhist, I am not thereby licensed to dismiss appeals to the contrary historical evidence by noting that such evidence is not part of my perspective; in fact, the evidence should be. There is no more reason to despise external philosophical criticism than to despise external historical criticism. If I maintain that A rule of inference is valid if and only if everyone who is asked about it accepts it, thereby proposing to turn logic into a sort of sociology, I cannot reply to the objection that I assume a mutual implication not analyzable in my own terms without evacuating my claim of its intended content by saying something like Since I don’t agree, that doesn’t refute me. It does, whether I accept it or not. Consider, then, this argument:

- 1 I exist now.
- 2 If I exist now, it is logically possible that I exist now. (If a proposition P is true, then of course it is possible that it is true.)
- 3 It is logically possible that I exist now. (from 1 and 2)
- 4 If it is logically possible that I exist now, it is logically possible that I exist a moment from now.
- 5 It is logically possible that I exist a moment from now. (from 3 and 4)
- 6 If it is logically possible that I exist a moment from now, it is not logically possible that the existence a moment from now of something just like me would prevent me from existing a moment from now.

- 7 It is not logically possible that the existence a moment from now of something just like me would prevent me from existing a moment from now. (from 5 and 6)
- 8 If a Buddhist-type view of persons is true, then the existence a moment from now of something just like me would prevent me from existing a moment from now.¹⁴
- 9 If the existence a moment from now of something just like me would prevent me from existing a moment from now, then it is logically possible that the existence a moment from now of something just like me would prevent me from existing a moment from now. (See comment after 2.)
- 10 If a Buddhist-type view of persons is true, then it is logically possible that the existence a moment from now of something just like me would prevent me from existing a moment from now. (from 8 and 9)
- 11 A Buddhist-type view of persons is not true. (from 7 and 10)

The truth of the first premise, I take it, is not in question.¹⁵ The second premise invokes the unexceptionable principle If X is actual, then X is possible. The fourth premise notes that if my existing at all is logically possible, and my existing at time T1 is logically possible, there is nothing logically impossible about my existing at T2. Given the truth of premise 4, for any time T* you like, it is logically possible that I exist at T* and that there is something else just like me¹⁶ that also exists at T* that is neither identical to me at T* nor identical to what was me at T*-minusone; this is what premise 6 says. The remainder of the premises either simply state what is true about a Buddhist-type view or are entailed by premises already noted. This seems a powerful, indeed successful, external critique.

An internal critique of the view that persons are bundles

Internal critiques of the sort relevant here come in two brands: an argument to the effect that the Buddhist-type account is internally inconsistent, or an argument to the effect that a Buddhist-type account is inconsistent with other Buddhist claims. Jain and Buddhist doctrines now diverge on two further points. In order to express them precisely, let us adopt a bit of technical terminology, but in order to express them clearly, let it be only a tiny bit. The Jain view of persons, we have noted, entails that for any person Lucy, all of Lucy exists at each moment at which Lucy exists. Lucy contains no elements; she is incomposite; she enjoys numerical identity over time. She is, then, a noncomposite endurer. On the Buddhist view, there are no noncomposite endurers. Instead, there are noncomposite nonendurers. These are single momentary constituents. There are composite nonendurers. These are bundles of noncomposite nonendurers. There are composite endurers. These are successions of composite nonendurers.

Certain claims regarding recompense¹⁷ and memory naturally arise from a Jain account of persons. The claims are these:

- (J1*) If Lucy at T1 receives recompense for something A done by a person at time T, then Lucy at T1 is a noncomposite endurer who is numerically identical to the person (the noncomposite endurer) who did A at T.
- (J2*) If Lucy at time T1 remembers performing action A at time T, then Lucy is a noncomposite endurer who is numerically identical at T and T1.

It is necessarily true that no Buddhist person/recompense pair ever satisfy (J1*) and that no Buddhist person/memory pair ever satisfy (J2*).¹⁸

The Buddhist replacements for (J1*) and (J2*) will be something along the lines of:

- (B1*) *If Lucy at T1 receives recompense for something A done by a person at time T, then Lucy at T1 is a composite nonendurer who is a member of (an element of or a constituent in) a composite endurer in which the composite nonendurer that did A at T is an earlier member.¹⁹
- (B2*) If Lucy at time T1 remembers performing action A at time T, then Lucy at T1 is a composite nonendurer who is a member of (an element of or a constituent in) a composite endurer in which the composite nonendurer that did A at T is an earlier member.

If you like, (the right sort of) composite nonendurer is a Buddhist person(1) and (the right sort of) composite endurer is a Buddhist person(2). Recompense and memory require that the recompense and the rememberer be persons(1) within the same person(2).

The doctrines cited in (J1*) and (J2*) require that there be noncomposite endurers; that among the denizens of the actual world such things are to be found. Consider these replacements for (J1*) and (J2*):

- (B1*a) If Lucy at T1 receives recompense for something A done by a person at time T, then Lucy at T1 is a composite nonendurer who is identical to a composite nonendurer which did A at T.²⁰
- (B2*a) If Lucy at time T1 remembers performing action A at time T, then Lucy at T1 is a composite nonendurer who is identical to the composite endurer that did A at T.

Of course, it is logically impossible that anyone ever satisfy the conditions laid down in (B1*a) or (B2*a). Thus there is strong pressure for a Buddhist to avoid them. Unless there are composite endurers who are things in addition to composite nonendurers (and who are persons), there will be no such thing as reincarnation, recompense, or memories. But it seems that, on the Buddhist-type account, there cannot be any such thing as composite endurers save in the insipid sense in which “composite endurers” refers to one composite nonendurer and then to another and then to another, which of course is not a sense of there being composite endurers in addition to there being composite nonendurers.

Consistency²¹

While there are various problems in the neighborhood,²² one looms over the rest. On the Buddhist-type account of persons, all there is to a composite endurer at time T is its single composite nonendurer constituent that exists only at T. All there is to a composite endurer at time T1 is its single composite nonendurer constituent that exists only at T1. Reference to a composite endurer that exists at both T and T1 is only verbally distinct from reference to a composite nonendurer at T and another composite nonendurer at T1; terms multiply, but entities do not increase.

Consider this argument:²³

- 1 If W is all that X is at time T, then X is identical to W at time T.
- 2 For every composite endurer E that exists at time T, there is a composite nonendurer *E that exists at time T such that *E is all there is of E at T.
- 3 For every composite endurer E that exists at time T, there is a composite nonendurer *E that exists at time T such that *E is identical to E (from 1 and 2).
- 4 If composite nonendurer *E is identical to E, then E cannot outlast *E.
- 5 For every composite endurer E that exists at time T, E does not exist other than at T.
- 6 It is logically impossible that anything that does not exist other than at time T be a composite endurer.
- 7 It is logically impossible that there be composite endurers.

Put it this way: let E1 and E2 be composite nonendurers that exist, respectively, at T1 and T2. Let E be a proposed composite endurer whose only elements are E1 and E2. Then:

- 1* At T1, E1 is all there is of E.
- 2* At T2, E2 is all there is of E.
- 3* If 1 is true, then E1 is identical to E.
- 4* If 2 is true, then E2 is identical to E.
- 5 E1 is identical to E. (from 1 and 3)
- 6 E2 is identical to E. (from 2 and 4)
- 7 E1 is not identical to E2.²⁴

But the set of propositions (5, 6, 7) is inconsistent. Thus a succession of bundles is not anything more than the bundles in the succession. No doctrine not applicable to the latter can be true of the former.²⁵ There cannot be any composite endurers if these are construed as items that inhabit the world in addition to composite nonendurers. No composite nonendurer can be justly recompensed for, or remember performing, the deeds of an earlier composite nonendurer. So no recompensation or remembering can occur. So there is no reincarnation-and-karma cycle and no Buddha remembers past lives. The strategy of saying “What recompense really is . . .” or “What memory really is . . .” and filling it in a manner compatible with there only being composite nonendurers is like answering, when one has shown you to have offered an invalid argument of the form If A then B; B; therefore A, that what you mean by “valid argument” is any argument that you offer. Any victory so purchased is entirely empty. If that is all there is to recompense or memory, there is no recompense or memory for there to be anything to.

Copiers and annihilators

Another argument against complexity accounts of persons

Scenario one

The present critique involves four very simple thought experiments. The participants in these experiments are Edward, a very ordinary accountant, Tedward (who may or may not be identical to Edward), and Nedward (who may or not be identical to Edward or Tedward).

These experiments also involve a voting-booth-sized machine – the Digitator – that comes in four varieties, one for each scenario. Our first scenario has Edward entering into a Digitator 101. The Digitator 101 annihilates the person who enters it and produces an exact copy; Edward enters at time T1 and the Digitator 101 works instantly, annihilating what entered it and producing a copy. Let relation R be whatever relation the Complexity Account says makes successive bundles so related to be parts of the same person. The copy bears that relation R to the person who was annihilated. The popular terms for a Digitator 101 is "Copy-Annihilator" (see Figure 1) but the firm's advertising department insists on using the more formal name. What the Digitator 101 makes as it annihilates Edward we will call "Tedward" and the question that arises is: Is Tedward identical to Edward? Since Tedward bears relation R to Edward, the answer that a Complexity Account of Persons must give is affirmative; Tedward is identical to Edward.

Scenario two

Our second scenario has Edward entering a Digitator 101X. Sales of the 101 model have been slow; people have been uncommonly shy about using the ones that have been sold. The 101X model is popularly simply called the Copier model (see Figure 2). When Edward enters it, it does not annihilate Edward. Instead, it produces an exact copy of Edward, whom we will also call Tedward. Thus Edward enters at time T1, and at time T2 the machine has produced a being who bears to the Edward that entered the machine relation R, as does of course Edward at T2. Here, two questions arise: Is Edward at T2 identical to Edward at T1? Is Tedward identical to Edward? Since both Edward at T2 and Tedward bear relation R to Edward at T1, a Complexity Account of Persons must answer both questions in the affirmative. Edward at T2 is identical to Edward at T1. Tedward is identical to Edward. This, of course, raises a problem. Edward at T2 is not identical to Tedward. So either Edward at T2 is not identical to Edward at T1 or Tedward is not identical to Edward. Identity is reflexive and transitory. The fact, then, is that bearing relation R to one another cannot be sufficient to make two items the same person. For any Complexity Account of Persons, R is sufficient. Hence all of the Complexity Accounts of Persons are false.

Figure 1 Digitator 101

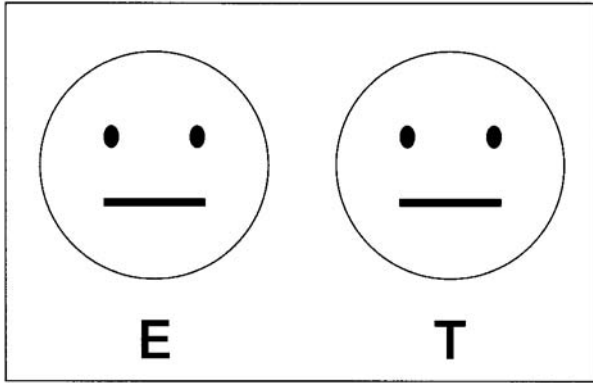

Copier

Figure 2 Digitator 101X

Scenario three

Our third scenario has Edward entering a Digitator 201 (see Figure 3). This machine is popularly called the Double Copier-Annihilator. Its improvement over the 101 version is that it annihilates the person who enters it but produces two copies, whom we will call Tedward and Nedward. Each copy, of course, bears relation R to Edward. Two questions arise. Is Tedward identical to Edward? Is Nedward identical to Edward?

Double Copier-Annihilator

Figure 3 Digitator 201

Since each bears relation R to Edward, any Complexity Account of Persons must answer affirmatively. Tedward is identical to Edward. Nedward is identical to Edward. But Tedward and Nedward are not identical to one another. Identity is reflexive and transitive. So they cannot both be identical to Edward, and any view that says they are is false because it says that.

Scenario four

Our final scenario has Edward entering a Digitator 201X, popularly called a Double Copier (see Figure 4). When Edward enters it at time T1, the machine at time T2 produces two copies of Edward – Tedward and Nedward – without annihilating Edward. But now Edward at T2, and Tedward, and Nedward all bear R to Edward at T1. So on any Complexity Account of Persons, all are identical to Edward at T1; each is the same person at T2 that Edward was at T1. But identity is reflexive and transitive. So Edward at T2, Tedward, and Nedward cannot be identical to one another. But then not more than one of them can be identical to – be the same person as – Edward at T1. So bearing R to one another cannot be sufficient for being the same person over time.

Reflections on the scenarios: the different results problem

It is striking that, then, on a Complexity View, one gets quite different results in scenario two from what one gets in scenario one, and again in scenario four from what one gets in scenario three. Given the Complexity View, in scenario one one would expect that Tedward would be Edward; in scenario two, one would not – that honor would be expected to go to the later Edward. In scenario four, one would also expect the later Edward to be identical to the earlier, whereas in scenario three there is no later Edward for the honor to go to (or else there are too many).

Figure 4 Digitator 201X

The different results problem has to do with the entailments of the Complexity View being different from what, intuitively, we would expect. What matters is not this fact, but what lies behind it. We now turn to that.

Reflections on the scenarios: the problem concerning logical impossibility

In scenarios one and two, the Complexity View requires that Tedward be identical to Edward, and in the second that both Tedward and the later Edward are identical to the earlier. But it is logically impossible that the earlier Edward be identical both to the later Edward and to Tedward. So the Complexity View requires that something contradictory be true. No contradiction can be true. So the Complexity View is false. While it is convenient to put the second scenario in terms of “(the later) Edward and Tedward” this is only a convenience. The point is that whichever of the beings that walk out of Double Copier we call “Edward” (or whatever we call them), there are two of them. Hence they are not identical to one another. On the Complexity View, both should be the same person as the Edward who stepped into the Double Copier. That is logically impossible. So the Complexity View is false. It should be remembered here, and throughout the discussion, that it is metaphysical, not epistemological, identity conditions that are relevant here.

Similarly, the Complexity View requires that in scenario three Edward is identical with both Tedward and Nedward, which is logically impossible since Tedward and Nedward are distinct. Again, while it is a convenience to give names to the beings who emerge from the Double Copier-Annihilator, whatever name one uses (and whether one uses any names or not), the Complexity View entails that both the beings who emerge are identical to the Edward who entered, and they cannot be. Similar comments hold regarding scenario four with the Double Copier; the Edward who entered the machine, given the Complexity View, is identical with three distinct persons, whatever they are (or are not) called. Again, what entails the logical possibility of the logically impossible is false.²⁶

Reflections on the scenarios: the perfect resemblance mistake

There is another way of looking at the difficulty. What lies behind these different results is this: given a Complexity View, the sheer fact that there would exist at a given time a person perfectly resembling me prevents me from existing at that time. But while there are lots of things on which my continuing to exist a moment from now depends, one of those things is not whether a moment from now there could or will be someone perfectly resembling me. I can exist a moment from now, and whether I do so or not is not dependent on whether a twin pops up. But on a Complexity View, I exist a moment from now only if no twin does pop up. That contention is false. Whatever entails a false contention is itself false. Hence the Complexity View is false. (Both twins would have to bear R to me.)

The argument here is this: the Complexity View entails that, for any person S at time T, S will exist at time T-plus-1 only if, at time T-plus-1, there are not two persons who (spatio-temporal properties aside) are perfectly resembling. My existing a moment from now is compatible with God creating my perfectly resembling twin a moment from now while not annihilating me. If my existing a moment from now is compatible with God creating my perfectly resembling twin a moment from now while not annihilating me, then it is false I will exist a moment from now only if there does not then also exist another person who perfectly resembles me. Hence, it is false that I will exist a moment from now only if there does not then also exist another person who perfectly resembles me. If it is false that I will exist a moment from now only if there does not then also exist another person who perfectly resembles me then the Complexity View is false. So the Complexity View is false. Indeed, since it entails things that are not even possibly true, it is not even possibly true; it is necessarily false.

The relevance of all this to Jainism and Buddhism

The relevance of these arguments to the dispute between Jainism and Buddhism is this: Theravada Buddhism holds a Complexity View of persons. The Jain tradition holds a Substantial View. The Complexity View is false. Hence the Theravada view is false. If there is only the Substantial View and the Complexity View, then the Substantial View is true.²⁷ It does not follow that it is true in the Jain version thereof.²⁸ But at the very least, the Jain view of what a person is will be closer to right than the Theravada Buddhist view.

On there being a fact of the matter

There is a reply to the criticisms that goes as follows: suppose that there is a person – Sam, let's say – at time T. Then at time T1 there come to be two persons – Sam1 and Sam2 – each of whom bears R (whatever relation the complexity theory takes to constitute being the same person) to Sam. Then we can say what we like – that Sam 1 is identical to Sam, that Sam2 is identical to Sam, that Sam has ceased to exist and been replaced by Sam1 and Sam2, that Sam1 is identical to Sam on even numbered days and Sam2 is identical to Sam on odd numbered days, or whatever. The claim is that there would be no fact of the matter about whether Sam continues to exist if Sam is followed by Sam1 and Sam2. What we say, if anything, in answer to Is either Sam1 or Sam2 identical to Sam? is conventional, arbitrary or at most pragmatic; there is no true answer.

The reply faces two problems. One is that there are contradictory answers to the question, and the Complexity View – as we have seen – entails them. What entails a contradiction is necessarily false. This critique is not something that can be successfully responded to by saying, “Well, I accept the Complexity View but when it comes to what it entails I just dismiss those entailments that are false.” The question is not about what someone who holds the Complexity View feels comfortable about doing, but about whether the theory is true, and if it entails falsehoods, it isn’t true.

The other problem becomes clear when one examines the denial that there would be a fact of the matter if Sam1 and Sam2 bear R (the alleged person-constituting relation) to Sam. The fact is that, on the Complexity View, there is no fact of the matter whether Sam1 and Sam2 come along or not.

One way of seeing this is by going back to, and reflecting on, the argument that has among its premises If I exist now, then it is logically possible that I exist a moment from now. This argument contends that (i) plainly, there is a fact of the matter about whether I exist now or not, and (ii) if (i) is true then for any time there is a fact of the matter about whether or not I exist then.

But here is another way of seeing the problem. Consider Sam and the way things ordinarily go – Sam exists at time T and Sam exists at time T1 and no Sam1 and Sam2 crop up. If Sam-at-T is identical to – is the same person as – Sam-at-T1, then necessarily Sam-at-T is identical to – is the same person as – Sam-at-T1. Metaphysical identity – e.g., the numerical identity of anything – is necessary if it obtains at all.²⁹

The argument for this can be put quite simply. Consider two possible worlds W1 and W2. Deny that identity is necessary. Suppose that A, B, and C all exist in possible worlds W1 and W2. Suppose also, as is possible if identity is contingent rather than necessary, that in W1, A is identical to B, and C is distinct from A and B. Suppose also, as is possible if identity is contingent rather than necessary, that in W2 A is identical to C, and B is distinct from A and C. If identity is contingent rather than necessary, W1 and W2 are possible as described. Now A-in-W1 is identical to A-in-W2, B-in-W1 is identical to B-in-W2, and C-in-W1 is identical to C-in-W2. But

A-in-W1 W1 is distinct from C-in-W1 and A-in-W2 is identical to C-in-W2; since C-in-W1 is identical to C-in-W2, it follows that A-in-W2 is identical to C-in-W1. Since A-in-W1 is identical to A-in-W2, it follows that “both” A-in-W1 and A-in-W2 are, and also are not, identical to “both” C-in-W1 and C-in-W2.

Now the second reply can be put simply. The Complexity View entails that Personal Identity View over time is logically contingent, and that view is self-contradictory. Thus on a Complexity View, there is no such thing as personal identity – were personal identity what a Complexity View says it is, there would be no such things. There would be a fact of the matter about Sam-at-T and Sam-at-T1 being the same person; he would not be, because there would be no such thing as being the same person over time.

Put differently, on the Complexity View, with or without Sam1-and-Sam2-type scenarios, there aren’t any persons – talk of persons is “conventional” in a sense in which talking about persons is a way of speaking to which nothing that is a person corresponds. This, of course, is not an account of what persons are. It is a denial that there are any persons.

Substance theory

Jain dualism

There is a variety of arguments for mind–body dualism of the sort Jainism embraces. Some of them are clear failures. Epistemological arguments for mind–body dualism infer from something about the way in which we know minds and bodies to the conclusion that the mind is distinct from the body. Let $X = \textit{my mind's existing or that my mind exists}$, as grammatical structure dictates; let $Y = \textit{my body's existing or that my body exists}$, as grammatical structure dictates.

Argument 1: I can think of X without thinking of Y; If I can think of X without thinking of Y, then $\textit{not}(X = Y)$, so: $\textit{not}(X = Y)$.

Argument 2: I cannot be mistaken with respect to X but I can be mistaken with respect to Y; If I cannot be mistaken with respect to X but I can be mistaken with respect to Y, then $\textit{not}(X = Y)$, so: $\textit{not}(X = Y)$.

Argument 3: I cannot doubt X but I can doubt Y; If I cannot doubt X but I can doubt Y then $\textit{not}(X = Y)$, so: $\textit{not}(X = Y)$.

Argument 4: I can be directly aware of X but I cannot be directly aware of Y; If I can be directly aware of X but I cannot be directly aware of Y then $\textit{not}(X = Y)$, so: $\textit{not}(X = Y)$.

The problem with this sort of argument is that, in each case, the italicized middle premise is false. "Can" here means "it is logically possible that." Consider these objections:

Reply To Argument 1: I can (It is logically possible that I) think of the cat Socks without thinking of the Clintons' favorite cat, because it is logically possible that Socks is not the Clintons' favorite cat. But it does not follow from this that Socks is not the Clintons' favorite cat.

Reply To Argument 2: I cannot be mistaken if I think that two is greater than one, and I can be mistaken if I think that your favorite number is greater than one, but it does not follow that your favorite number is not two.

Reply To Argument 3: I cannot doubt that I exist but I can doubt that I am the one who is supposed to take out the garbage, but it does not follow that I am not the one who is supposed to take out the garbage.

Reply To Argument 4: I can be directly aware of my being in pain and I cannot be directly aware of my feeling worse than ever before, but it does not follow that my being in pain is not my feeling worse than ever before.

Epistemological arguments such as these fail to prove their conclusions. The question remains as to whether other sorts of arguments are better.

Arguments for Jain dualism

Philosophers James W. Cornman and Keith Lehrer remark that mind–body dualism seems to be essential to most religions. The body will disintegrate after death, but according to the doctrines of many religions, the soul, the immaterial part of us which is quite distinct and different from the body, will live on eternally . . . The primary philosophical problem is to find out whether dualistic interactionism or some other position is the most plausible view about the nature of a person.³⁰

This remark fits at least Jainism. Consider this argument:

- 1 It is logically possible that Manindra is self-conscious and Manindra has no bodily states.

- 2 If it is logically possible that Manindra is self-conscious and Manindra has no bodily states then Manindra's being self-conscious is not identical to Manindra's having bodily states. So:
- 3 Manindra's being self-conscious is not identical to Manindra's having bodily states.

This argument assumes some such claim as:

- (N) If Manindra's being self-conscious is identical to Manindra's having bodily states, then necessarily, Manindra's being self-conscious is identical to Manindra's having bodily states.

The argument is plainly valid, and if (N) is true then premise 2 is true. (N) expresses the doctrine of the necessity of metaphysical identity, for which an argument was presented earlier. If – as appears the case – that argument is a proof that extends our knowledge, and premise 1 is plainly true, then the conclusion is true.

One way of continuing is to note regarding being self-conscious that anything that has it would be radically different if it irretrievably lost it; its causal powers would be greatly diminished and its causal potencies would be significantly altered. Being self-conscious is a very plausible property for being a kind-defining property or being an essential property of anything that has it.³¹ This reflection leads naturally to this continuation of the argument:

- 4 It is logically possible for Manindra to exist as a self-conscious being and for Manindra to have no body.
- 5 If it is logically possible for Manindra to exist as a self-conscious being and for Manindra to have no body then Manindra existing as a self-conscious being is not identical to Manindra's having a body. So:
- 6 Manindra's existing as a self-conscious being is not identical to Manindra's having a body.

This brief argument is powerful and controversial.

In spite of the fact that mind–body dualism seems not subject to the sorts of critique to which complexity accounts of persons are subject, it is widely rejected and often despised in contemporary academic studies. What is favored instead is materialism, the view that there are material substances but not substances of any other kind.³² The materialism/dualism controversy is complex and fascinating. There do not seem to be such powerful arguments for materialism that dualism should be ruled out as a viable position.

Arguments against dualism

There are widely accepted arguments against dualism. One such argument contends that materialism is simpler, positing less kinds of substance, though why having two sorts of material substance, one capable of self-consciousness and one not, is in any significant way simpler is as unclear as why appeal to simplicity of kinds of substances should carry the day (or favor materialism, since idealism is simpler than dualism in the same sense as that in which materialism is). The most frequent criticism is that the only version of dualism that is plausible is interactionism, the position that mental events cause physical events and physical events cause mental events. But mind–body interaction, we are told, is impossible – how could such different things as an immaterial substance and a material substance interact? This is perhaps the only time in contemporary philosophy in which the causal likeness principle is invoked – the claim that in order for X to affect Y with respect to some property Q, X must have Q or something like Q. There is neither criterion for what degree of similarity is required nor reason to accept the principle. Dualists find it unclear why color experience being caused by non-colored things, colds and flu by bacteria and viruses, pain by unfeeling things, and the like somehow are unproblematic whereas mind–body interaction is problematic.

It seems that the basic reason for the rejection of dualism as a live option in much of contemporary academia has to do with what might be called the mapping problem: how does one relate the description of the physical world, insofar as we can provide this, to the descriptions true of everyday choices and actions? Roughly, how does one map our descriptions of the mental world onto our descriptions of the physical world?

It is tempting to deny that there is a mapping problem by suggesting that our descriptions of the physical world, cast in natural science terms, and our descriptions of persons and their freedom of thought and action, are incommensurable in the sense that they do not bear logical relations to one another – that they do enter into relations of consistency, inconsistency, entailment, and the like. The problem is that the suggestion is false; given that a description of the physical world is true, there are hosts of actions not available that would be available were the physical world otherwise. For example, if the correct description D1 of the physical places an orange at place P at time T, then at T it is not possible to bring the orange to P – it is already there. If the correct description included the information that the orange was elsewhere than P, bringing it to P would (given other features of things) be possible. In such ways, and much more complex ones, what makes a particular description of the physical world at a given time true also constrains what can be done in that world at and after that time.³³

Eliminative materialism, which denies that there are any mental properties, dismisses the mapping problem by denying that there is anything that mental descriptions describe. It thereby dismisses the possibility of distinguishing between good science and bad, and between science and superstition. Those who claim that the distinction between the mental and the physical captures, not substances or properties, but ways of talking, both fail to solve the mapping problem and give no account of the phenomenological and explanatory differences between the mental and the material. Property dualists grant that there are both mental and physical properties, but are no better at dealing with the mapping problem than are substance dualists. Insofar as its roots are intellectual, the current disposition to dismiss dualism seems to lie in the hope that if one embraces property dualism, one can grant the phenomenological and explanatory differences between the mental and the physical and have the best chance, some day, of solving the mapping problem. If, as argued earlier, being self-conscious has strong credentials as a kind-defining property, property dualism is a longer step toward substance dualism than most property dualists would like.

Mounting a full-scale defense of a substantivalist and dualist view of persons would require more space than is available here. What has been done is this: we have argued that while epistemological arguments for dualism fail, there are metaphysical arguments of much more power in its favor, and the objections against it have much less force than is usually assumed. What follows is that, insofar as Cornman and Lehrer are right about what (monotheistic) religions take to be true about persons, their perspective is far more defensible than it currently is usually thought to be.

Questions for reflection

- 1 What is the difference between an appeal to argument and an appeal to experience?
- 2 Offer a reasoned assessment of the core claims made by Advaita Vedanta.
- 3 Explain and argue for or against the Complexity View of persons.
- 4 Explain and argue for or against the view that persons are self-conscious substances or souls.
- 5 Is the doctrine of metaphysical identity true?
- 6 Explain, and argue for or against, the view that if one person claims There are persons, and someone else denies this, they dispute over a merely conventional matter.

Annotated reading

- Donagan, Alan (1987) Choice: The Essential Element in Human Action, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul. Argues for a view of persons as enduring free agents.
- Hoffman, Joshua and Rosenkrantz, Gary S. (1994) Substance Among Other Categories, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. Discusses various views of what a substance is, objections to these views, and arguments for them.
- Hoffman, Joshua and Rosenkrantz, Gary S. (1997) Substance: Its Nature and Existence, London: Routledge. See previous reference.
- Lowe, E. J. (1989) Kinds of Being, Oxford: Basil Blackwell. Discusses substance theories and competing theories, arguments for and against each.
- Lowe, E. J. (1996) Subjects of Experience, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. See previous reference.
- Parfit, Derek (1984) Reasons and Persons, Oxford: Oxford University Press. Defends a Buddhist-type account of persons.

CHAPTER 13

Arguments concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions (2)

Appeals to enlightenment experience

Self-authentication

Advaita appeal to enlightenment experience

Jain-type appeals to experience

Buddhist-type appeals to experience

The contrasting arguments

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Arguments concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions (2)

Appeals to enlightenment experience

Appeals to religious experience as evidence for religious belief are not, of course, limited to consideration of experiences that are taken by their subjects to be experiences of God. Appeals are made to enlightenment experiences as well. While, as noted earlier, the psychological features (detachment, calm, bliss, and the like) of Advaita, Jain, and Buddhist enlightenment experiences are very similar, their reported structure and their proposed doctrinal significance are quite different. Enlightenment experiences are not viewed by religious traditions in which they are prized as a sort of cosmic Prozac; they are not primarily prized for their psychological features. They are believed to cure, not remove symptoms, and the ills they are said to cure are not depression, but the basic illness common to us all, as each particular religious tradition perceives it. If a devotee of Advaita Vedanta appeals to Advaita enlightenment experience as evidence for religious belief, it will be Advaita beliefs that are said to be supported by the experience. Analogously, of course, for Jain or Buddhist appeals to Jain or Buddhist enlightenment experiences.

The exact nature of the appeals to experiential evidence

An appeal to experience as evidence typically involves, as we have seen, referring to a description of the experience and explicitly or implicitly assuming some conceptual connection between the occurrence of an experience that fits that description and the proposition for whose truth that occurrence is said to provide evidence. The core idea is:

- 1 An experience that fits description D has occurred.
- 2 If an experience that fits description D has occurred, that fact is evidence that proposition P is true. So:
- 3 That fact is evidence that P is true.

One who wishes to make a claim like 3 regarding some religious doctrine requires that some claims like 1 and 2 are true when one replaces “D” by a relevant description and “P” by a statement of a relevant doctrine. The role of the connecting premise may be implicit, necessary for the appeal to experience but unstated. Like versions of the principle of experiential evidence, the connecting premises are typically assumed but not asserted; indeed, the connecting premise typically will simply be an assumed principle of experiential evidence.

Advaita, Jain, and Buddhist enlightenment experiences are called, respectively, moksha, kevala, and nirvana experiences. We can expect, then, appeals to experience of the following sort.

Experiential evidence and enlightenment experiences

Our question concerning enlightenment experience is the same as the one raised regarding numinous experience: is it direct evidence (evidence not mediated through theory) for religious belief? If it is such evidence, one will be able to argue successfully as follows.

Advaita Vedanta

- A1 Moksha experiences (in which one realizes one’s identity with qualityless Brahman) have occurred.
- A2 If moksha experiences have occurred, that fact is evidence that We are identical to qualityless Brahman is true. So:
- A3 That fact is evidence that We are identical to qualityless Brahman is true.

Jainism

- J1 Kevala experiences (in which one realizes one’s existential independence or ontological security and one’s omniscience) have occurred.
- J2 If kevala experiences have occurred, that fact is evidence that We have existential independence or ontological security and are omniscient is true. So:
- J3 The fact is evidence that We have existential independence or ontological security and are omniscient is true.

Theravada Buddhism

- T1 Nirvana experiences (in which one realizes one’s nature as composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements) have occurred.

- T2 If nirvana experiences have occurred, that fact is evidence that We are composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of bundles of such elements is true. So:
- T3 That fact is evidence that We are composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of bundles of such elements is true.¹

Further, in treating these appeals to experience in the same sort of way as we treated appeals to numinous experience, the first premise of each triad must be read phenomenologically; thus we will have:

- A1* Moksha experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's identity with qualityless Brahman) have occurred.
- J1* Kevala experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's existential independence or ontological security and one's omniscience) have occurred.
- T1* Nirvana experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's nature as composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements) have occurred.

These will replace A1, J1, and T1, and the beginning (the antecedent) of A2, J2, and T2 will be modified accordingly. The central question then is whether it is true that:

- A2* If moksha experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's identity with qualityless Brahman) have occurred, this is evidence that one is identical to qualityless Brahman.
- J2* If kevala experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's existential independence or ontological security and one's omniscience) have occurred, then this is evidence that one is existentially independent or has ontological security and one is omniscient.
- T2* If nirvana experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's nature as composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements) have occurred then this is evidence that one is composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements.

If one or more of these is true, then there is some principle of experiential evidence that plays the same role relevant to A2*, J2*, and T2* as our earlier principles do relative to similar claims concerning numinous experience. Is there any such principle?

Two counterbalancing considerations

It is sometimes suggested that those who have had religious experiences are the real experts as to what those experiences show – as to what they are evidence for. This claim is often made regarding enlightenment experiences. While perhaps, just by virtue of having them, persons who have enlightenment experiences are experts about what it is like to have the sort of religious experience they have had, this does not tell us anything about whether such experiences are self-authenticating relative to any religious claims based on such experiences, or whether these experiences provide evidence for the beliefs based on them.

If some have claimed that religious experiencers – those who have had religious experiences – are thereby experts about the reliability or veridicality of those experiences (about whether or not they correctly represent the world), it should be noted that others have claimed that religious experiencers are the last people one should expect to have any such expertise. They have argued that the very having of such experiences – experiences that are often emotionally very powerful and that sometimes result in instantaneous conversions or redirections of a life – renders them in no position to evaluate the cognitive significance of such experiences objectively. Further, particularly in the traditions that center on enlightenment experience, the investment in having such experiences is great. One walks for years in a loin cloth from one end of India to the other, begging one's bread. Or one spends years learning the meanings of ancient arcane texts under the relentless guidance of demanding gurus. Or one spends a near lifetime on good works, in each case instead of devoting oneself to seeking pleasure, wealth, and power. Also the status given to those who attain the goal is high (being elevated to a semidivine status where others bow in your presence or dare not even look you in the face). The investment and rewards are just too great for anyone who claims to have had any such experience to be trusted to be at all rational in his reasoning or judgment regarding its cognitive significance.

Whatever weight either sort of consideration has is balanced by the other sort, and neither sort justifies concluding either that religious experiencers are the experts regarding what their experiences evidentially justify or that if those experiences serve as evidence they can only do so for those who have them.

Self-authentication

Religious experiences are often said to be self-authenticating or self-guaranteeing, so that appeal to them gives one a uniquely secure source of experiential confirmation. If this is so, it is obviously an important fact about religious experiences. It would be particularly relevant to their status as evidence for religious beliefs. What exactly, then, is it for some experience to be self-authenticating? Self-authentication is a three-term relation; there is a person to whom an experience authenticates, an experience that does the authenticating, and a belief or proposition that is authenticated. Further, the idea is, the belief or proposition in question is evidenced or authenticated in a particularly strong way – in such a way, in fact, that the person cannot be mistaken in accepting that belief or in believing that proposition. Formally, the idea can be put in this fashion:

Chandra's experience E is self-authenticating regarding proposition P if and only if Chandra has experience E, it is logically impossible that Chandra have E and proposition P be false, and Chandra rests his acceptance of P on his having had E.^{2,3}

If there are experiences that satisfy these conditions regarding persons and beliefs, the most obvious examples do not concern religious beliefs. Suppose that Wendy, perhaps feeling philosophical, reflects that, in contrast to Santa Claus and unicorns but like salamanders and her dog, she exists. Reflection is, after all, a kind of experience, and if Wendy reflects at time T that she exists at T (a reflection that, she notes, includes her believing that she exists), then she is fully justified if she also notes that her reflecting that she exists is impossible unless she does exist; Wendy's experience of believably reflecting on the fact of her existence is such that it is logically impossible that she do so and her belief be false. So if she rests her belief that she exists at T on the experience of believably reflecting that she exists at T, her experience of believably reflecting that she exists at T can be self-authenticating regarding her belief that she exists at T. If we ask, then, what sorts of beliefs there are that can receive self-authentication from experience, it seems clear that among them are: one's belief that one now exists, that one is now conscious, that one now has at least one belief, and the like. Perhaps if one believes that one is now in pain, then it is true that one is now in pain (though one can be wrong about the pain's cause and its location). These sorts of experiences and beliefs represent the least controversial cases of self-authentication.

Consider claims central to Advaita Vedanta, Jainism, and Theravada Buddhism:

AV We are identical to qualityless Brahman.

J We have existential independence or ontological security and are omniscient.

TB *We are composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of bundles of such elements.*⁴

Each of these claims, if they are true at all, are – as their adherents insist – true whether we know them to be true, and true independent of anyone having any enlightenment experience.⁵ Further, each tradition holds that one can believe two of these three claims, and have the experience that the tradition that accepts this claim alleges confirms that claim, without that claim being true. It seems plain that it is logically possible that one believe any of We are identical to qualityless Brahman, We have existential independence or ontological security and are omniscient, or We are composed at a time of a bundle of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements and believe falsely, just as it is logically possible that one believe oneself to be more courageous than one is, or free from illness while a disease silently takes its toll, or devoid of pride while enamored of one's humility. It may well also be that in all three cases, one can have the relevant enlightenment experience, believe the corresponding doctrine, think the experience confirms the doctrine, and be mistaken on all counts. Each tradition holds views that entail that the members of the other two traditions are in exactly this position.

None of this is denied by even the strongest proponents of the self-authenticating character of enlightenment experiences.⁶ What is claimed is not that it is logically impossible that one believe the preferred doctrine and that doctrine nonetheless be false, but that (i) it is logically impossible that anyone have an enlightenment experience that self-authenticates a doctrine and the doctrine nonetheless be false, and (ii) enlightenment experiences (of the right kind) are self-authenticating regarding (the right) doctrine. While (i) is true by definition of "self-authentication," (ii) is a substantial claim that we will explore.

Descriptions

In exploring it, we begin with this question: What sort of descriptions will be true of an enlightenment experience that is self-authenticating regarding, say, a Jain religious doctrine? To put the same question in a different way, what sort of phenomenology or observable features must such an experience have? Since what is said to be self-authenticated is We have existential independence or ontological security and are omniscient, it must have a phenomenology appropriate to confirming that claim. The simplest description will be something like at least apparently recognizing one's existential independence or ontological security and one's omniscience. There are various problems with offering this as the description relevant for the appeal to experience as evidence.

Suppose that you and I are looking at an ancient coin. You claim it is Roman, and I claim it is Greek. I say I see it is Greek and regard the case as closed. You claim I see it is Roman and regard the case as closed. But at least one of us is wrong, and neither of us has provided any evidence by describing the experience in a way that simply assumes that our claim is true. It is not that I express my evidence by saying I see it is Greek; I do not thereby recite any evidence whatever. I merely repeat my claim. If your experience is to be evidence that the coin is Roman,⁷ it must be the case that there are features that the coin at least seems to have such that, if the coin has those features, it is at least probably Roman. So to speak, the phenomenology of your coin-experience must be Romanesque. For example, it may bear the likeness of a Roman emperor rather than a Greek statesman. If I am to have evidence, the coin must at least appear to me to have some feature such that, if the coin has that feature, that fact supports its Greekness. For example, it may bear the likeness of a Greek statesman rather than a Roman emperor.

The case of enlightenment experience is analogous. Simply to assert, for some religious claim C, that one has an experience in which one recognizes or realizes its truth, with no specification of what it is about the experience that confirms C, is pointless so far as evidence is concerned.

Evidence about what?

Enlightenment experience is supposed to teach one about one's nature – about what one is. This is obvious in the cases of Advaita Vedanta (identity with qualityless Brahman) and Jainism (being an indestructible, all-knowing self-conscious substance). It is typical of Buddhist traditions to deny that anything has a “same-nature” or essence. Nonetheless, it is also typical of Buddhist traditions to hold that every item that we commonsensically regard as an enduring thing is really composed at a time of a bundle of momentary elements and over time of a series of momentary bundles of elements. Whether or not one calls this a doctrine of the nature of persons,⁸ the idea is that this is what persons really are. For each of these traditions, the goal is the truth about oneself.

If, however, any of these claims is true, it is true about everyone, not just about oneself; the idea is that if anyone then everyone is identical to qualityless Brahman or is an indestructible enduring mind or is composed only of momentary elements. Further, these claims can be true only if various other things are false. For example, if monotheism is true, God is ultimate and has qualities (so there is no qualityless Brahman), persons are created and endure by divine courtesy (they are not indestructible), and God is neither transient nor composed of transient elements (it is false that everything is impermanent).

Particular experiences, universal claims

The various doctrines about persons are universal in scope; the experiences occur to particular individuals. When we ask whether these particular experiences provide evidence for claims that are universal in their scope, we get different results depending on the case. Suppose that enlightenment experience provides evidence that one is identical to qualityless Brahman. Will this also provide evidence that everyone else is? The question is peculiar in a way that arises from the doctrine itself. If A is identical to B and C is identical to B, then A is identical to C. So if you are identical to qualityless Brahman and I am too, we are identical to one another; so there isn't "anyone else." If there is anyone else, the doctrine is false.

Suppose that enlightenment experience provides evidence that one is an indestructible mind or is composed of momentary elements. Will this also provide evidence that everyone else is? It will do so in the presence of a doctrine to the effect that the subject of the experience is a person and what makes her a person is the same as what makes everyone else a person, assuming that one is justified in taking these additional claims to be true. Discussing these issues in any detail would take us too far away from our basic concerns here. Thus we simply note that it is widely assumed that these sorts of additional claim are true.⁹

Phenomenologies that fit the claims

The right sort of phenomenology seems to be of this sort: for Advaita enlightenment experience, appearing or seeming to be identical with qualityless Brahman; for Jainism, appearing or seeming to be an indestructible and highly knowledgeable mind; for Buddhism, appearing or seeming to be only a bundle of transitory states. One might question whether these are, strictly speaking, possible phenomenological features of an experience. They seem, like being a Roman coin, to be features something could have only by virtue of other features also had by that thing. In the case of a Roman coin, bearing the image of an emperor is one such feature. In the enlightenment cases, presumably the relevant further features are such qualities as having no sense of possessing qualities, feeling indestructible, and being aware only of states of mind. It is, however, logically possible that one possesses qualities that one has no sense of having, feels indestructible while being dependent for existence on something else, and is aware of nothing but one's current mental states without being identical to those states even at the time at which one has them. Further, that one has no sense of having qualities is possible only if one does have qualities – to have no qualities at all is simply not to exist at all, and not existing gets very much in the way of having experiences. Having a sense of being indestructible is perfectly compatible with not being indestructible, and having a sense of being momentary is perfectly compatible with being an enduring thing.

One way of putting the problems with the notion that enlightenment experiences are self-authenticating with regard to Advaita, Jain, or Buddhist doctrinal claims is this:

- (i) the claims are, if true of one at all, true of one so long as one exists, whereas in the least controversial cases of self-authentication the claims that are authenticated have to do with one's existence right now or one's current, momentary states of awareness; the claims in cases where claims to self-authentication is plausible are about a time span that corresponds, and is limited, to the time during which the authenticating experience occurs;
- (ii) the quality or state ascribed to oneself by the claim is an observable quality – like being in pain – or is entailed by any quality anything has – like existing.

By contrast, the Advaita, Jain, and Buddhist claims concern times not limited to the duration of the enlightenment experience and qualities neither observable nor entailed by simply possessing any quality at all. Further, such states as seeming to oneself to be qualityless, seeming to be indestructible, seeming to be momentary are states that can easily be mistaken – one may seem to oneself to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary without these things being in fact true.

It is important to remember here that we are not asking what sort of phenomenological features an experience might have were one's having it to lead them to accept a particular religious doctrine, especially if one had it in a context in which it was expected that such experiences might occur – for example, within a meditative tradition the very purpose of which was the preparation for having such experiences whose interpretation was built into the institutional context within which the meditative practice occurred. We are not seeking to give a psychological explanation of enlightenment experiences, but asking whether these experiences provide self-authentication for certain religious beliefs.

What follows from our discussion is that they do not. The argument is not that Advaita Vedanta, Jainism, and Theravada Buddhism can all claim self-authentication for logically incompatible beliefs so that at least two of the traditions will be mistaken, though that is the case. The argument is that none of the enlightenment experiences possesses a phenomenology which self-authenticates the beliefs in question. It is not logically impossible that one have an enlightenment experience – whether Advaita Vedanta, Jain, or Buddhist – that possesses the relevant phenomenological features and it also is the case that the corresponding Advaita, Jain, or Buddhist doctrine is false. So enlightenment experiences do not self-authenticate doctrines based on them. The argument showing this can be made fully explicit as follows:

- 1 One's enlightenment experience is self-authenticating regarding a proposition that expresses the core Advaita, Jain, or Buddhist doctrinal claim if and only if:
 - (i) one seems (respectively) to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary,
 - (ii) it is logically impossible that one seems to oneself to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary, and one is not qualityless, indestructible, or momentary, and
 - (iii) one rests one's acceptance of core Advaita, Jain, or Buddhist doctrine on one's having seemed to oneself to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary.
- 2 It is not logically impossible that one seem to oneself to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary and one not be so. Hence:
- 3 One's enlightenment experience is not self-authenticating relative to Advaita, Jain, or Buddhist doctrine.

We have argued that enlightenment experiences are not self-authenticating regarding these claims. That they are not self-authenticating regarding the religious claims often based on them does not entail that these experiences are not evidence for those claims. Evidence need not be self-authenticating. So the next question is: Do enlightenment experiences provide evidence for religious beliefs?

Previous principles of experiential evidence

We have explained and defended some principles of experiential evidence. They are examples of claims that can provide support for premises like the second steps of the brief three-step arguments sketched early in this chapter. These principles can be expressed as follows:

(P*) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and E is not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, then S's having E is evidence that X exists.

and

(P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of being aware of an experience-independently existing item X, and S (non-culpably) has no reason to think that E is canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, then S's having E provides S evidence that X exists.

Some experiences, we have noted, are matters of someone's at least seeming to perceive something which, if it exists at all, exists independent of its being experienced. These have a particular structure – subject/ consciousness/object. Other experiences are matters of someone's feeling a certain way. These also have a particular structure – subject/content. Seeing an apple tree is of the former sort; so is merely seeming to see an apple tree. Feeling nauseous or dizzy, and experiencing generalized anxiety or euphoria, are examples of the latter sort. It is important to keep in mind the differences between experiences that are subject/ consciousness/object in structure and experiences that are subject/ content in structure.

Subject/content experience and a principle of experiential evidence

Treating subject/content experience as evidence requires, implicitly if not explicitly, a principle of experiential evidence different from (P*) and (P) which refer to evidence for the existence of experience-independent things and apply to subject/consciousness/object experiences. Where we allow being in a state to be broadly construed (so as to cover things like having a quality, being an event, and the like), consider:

(P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of S being aware of an experience-dependently existing quality or state X of S, then S's having E is evidence that S is in state, or has quality, X.

Experiencing pain, euphoria, or anxiety is evidence that one is in a state of pain, euphoria, or anxiety.¹⁰ Religious claims do not typically concern such private, momentary psychological states, and no religion bases its core doctrines on their occurrence. Being identical to Brahman or being qualityless, being indestructible or a soul that exists independently, and being a momentary being or a being whose constituents are momentary are not features or qualities or states that are experience-dependent. If someone has any of them, she has them whether she experiences herself as having them or not. Thus the principle is not the proper principle of enlightenment experiences. The qualities the relevant religious beliefs ascribe to people are not experience-dependent properties.

(P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of S being aware of an experience-dependently existing quality or state X of S, then S's having E is evidence that S is in state, or has quality X

One might try instead:

(P*) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of S being introspectively aware of being in an experience-independently existing state X of S, then S's having E is evidence that S is in state X.

This principle raises the question of whether it is possible to be introspectively aware of an experience-independent property. The notion of introspection is not lucid. It is not obvious what the range of introspection is – not clear what is and is not a possibly introspected quality or state. One's cognitive states – e.g., one's thinking about squares or wondering where to look for a new blowfish – are known by introspection. So are one's psychological states – being depressed about the demise of one's old blowfish but relieved that one's guppy is healthy again. Whether or not one is in pain is learned by introspection. If one wants "introspection" to refer to a particularly reliable state, then one will count feeling cold and feeling in love to be introspective states, but not being cold or being in love, since one can feel cold though one's body is warm or feel like one is in love when one but suffers a short-lived infatuation that vanishes at the first sign of inconvenience. Thus, in keeping with the idea of so characterizing introspection that it is a particularly reliable sort of experience, let us restrict the scope of introspection as follows:

Person S is introspectively aware of state or quality Q only if S being in or possessing Q depends on S's being aware of being in or possessing Q.

One can introspectively seem to oneself to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary in the sense that one can believe this to be so. Nothing could make it true that one was qualityless. Even if one had an experience in which one seemed to one to have no qualities, this would not show, or even be evidence that, one was without qualities. In fact, having qualities would be a condition of having any such experience. Being indestructible would not prevent one from having a sense that was indestructible – believing that one is indestructible is not incompatible with one's being so. But having such a sense or belief would not by itself be evidence that one was indestructible. Suppose a momentary being could believe or feel it was momentary. This would not show, or even be evidence, that it was indestructible or momentary. Actually being indestructible or actually being momentary would be a non-introspectible property. Nor is the sort of property such that, even if one has it, it would be open to introspective awareness. Nor are any of being qualityless, being indestructible, being composed of momentary items features or qualities or states such that, if one has or is in them, one necessarily would know it, or one would more likely know it rather than not know it, or more likely know it about oneself than would someone else. Like such features or qualities or states as being the brightest person in the class, having a good chance to be elected to the Senate, possessing a more misleading view of oneself than most people, being identical to the future spouse of the most attractive person in the class, and a great many others, one could believe oneself to have these features or qualities even when one did not. One could have these features or qualities and not believe that one did. Being mistaken in these ways is not only possible; it would not even be surprising. Behind these facts lies the more basic fact noted above: being qualityless, being indestructible, being composed of momentary items are not introspectible properties; even if one has them, one cannot be introspectively aware of having them. Further, there is no introspective feature that one can be aware of that entails one has them.

Since being qualityless, being indestructible, being composed of momentary items, unlike being in pain, feeling anxious, being euphoric, are not introspectively accessible or observable states, Principle (P*), which makes essential reference to introspectibly accessible states, does not apply to them. Thus the principle

(P*) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of S being introspectively aware of being in an experience-independently existing state or quality X of S, then S's having E is evidence that S is in state, or has quality, X will not do. Experience-independently existing states or qualities, on the construal of introspection on which it is particularly reliable, are not possible objects of introspection.

One might instead suggest something like:

(P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of S being non-introspectively aware of being in an experience-independently existing state or having an experience-independently possessed quality X of S, then S's having E is evidence that S is in state, or possesses quality, X.

The question that (P) raises is whether a subject/content experience can be non-introspective and yet be direct evidence for someone being in an experience-independent state or having some experience-independent quality. Sensory experience and monotheistic religious experience are subject/consciousness/object, not subject/content.¹¹ The requisite sort of experience would be direct evidence that one was in an experience-independent state or had an experience-independent quality and yet be a subject/content experience.

An experience of the kinesthetic sort in which one is aware that one is moving or of the position of one's body is not subject/content – it is awareness of one's body moving or being in a certain position. Feeling a tingling in one's fingers is also subject/consciousness/object. These sorts of experiences, like sensory experience of physical objects other than one's body and introspective experience, won't provide an analogy for the sort of experience that would provide evidence for the religious beliefs of enlightenment traditions.

One who holds that enlightenment experiences provide such evidence will contend that such experiences are unique in kind. Thus the failure to find similar experiences is not surprising or problematic. The idea is that enlightenment experiences just are awareness of one's being qualityless, one's being indestructible, or one's being momentary or composed of momentary constituents. The problem with this suggestion is that these states or qualities are not directly observable. Nothing can be qualityless; that would effectively get in the way of its existing. One could discern the momentariness of something else, but one would have to outlast it in order to do so. A person could be indestructible just as a person could be stronger or smarter than any other person. A person who was indestructible or strongest or smartest could learn that he had this exalted status. But the ways of learning this would not include directly experiencing those qualities in oneself. Regarding being strongest, one could discover that one could lift heavier weights, or throw heavy objects farther, than anyone else could. Regarding being smartest, one could find that one's intelligence test results were above anyone else's or that one has made discoveries in vastly different areas that no one else had thought of.

Discovering that one was indestructible would be harder. No one claims the indestructibility of one's body. Those who have held to the inherent indestructibility of the person have identified the person with the mind or soul. They have then argued that the mind or soul is immaterial and not subject to anything analogous to erosion or decomposition. Plato's Phaedo is a classic example. Jain texts at least contain the raw materials for such an argument. But unlike being in pain, being indestructible is something one would seem to have to learn one had by inference. Even if one had some sort of series of experiences in which one had reason to believe that, if one's mind or soul destructible, it would by now have been destroyed, this would still be knowledge by inference, not by direct awareness.

The problem, then, is that the relevant states or qualities – the ones that we would have to have awareness of in order for enlightenment experience to be evidence for religious beliefs – are not possible objects of awareness. If this is so, then there will not be any principle of experiential evidence by virtue of which being aware of such states or qualities is evidence for religious belief, because there will be no such awareness to be evidence. The principle

(P) If a person S has an experience E which, if reliable, is a matter of S being non-introspectively aware of being in an experience-independently existing state or having an experience-independently possessed quality X of S, then S's having E is evidence that S is in state, or possesses quality, X will not help because it will not apply to enlightenment experiences.

The fact of the matter is that there seems to be no principle of experiential evidence on which enlightenment experience provides evidence for religious belief.

The argument stated specifically regarding our three enlightenment traditions¹²

Consider our three cases.

Advaita

Appearing to be qualityless not only is not evidence that one is qualityless but is sufficient evidence for possession of qualities; it is logically impossible that one have any experience at all and not exist, and logically impossible that one exist without having qualities. Indian critics of Advaita Vedanta, the most famous of whom is Ramanuja, have pressed this decisive objection with great force and clarity.

Jainism and Buddhism

Appearing to oneself to be indestructible is not evidence that one is indestructible. Claims of indestructibility, of course, are not made regarding the body; Jain philosophers know as well as anyone that the human body is not indestructible. What they claim, along with Plato and Platonists, is that the mind or soul or person is indestructible in principle. The point remains, however, that the mind or soul or person having an experience in which it seems to itself to be indestructible in principle is not evidence that it is indestructible in principle. Not only is it logically possible that one have an experience in which it seems to them that they are indestructible though in fact they are not; it is also that having such an experience is not any evidence that one is indestructible, any more than having an experience in which one seems to oneself to be destructible is evidence that one is destructible. Similarly, a sense of one's existence as momentary, or as composed of momentary items is one thing, and one's being in momentary existence or being composed of things that exist only for an instant is another, and having a sense of one's momentariness is not evidence that one is merely momentary or that one is composed of momentary constituents.

The argument restated

The argument can be stated along the following lines. Consider three claims, each of which is true:

- 1 There are states, like being in pain, feeling happy, worrying about one's health, and the like, where one's having the sense that one is in pain, happy, or worried, justifies one's belief that one is in pain, happy, or worried – such states involve phenomenological awareness of the actual state that one ascribes to oneself and one's being aware of being in such a state is evidence that one is in it.¹³
- 2 There are other states, like thinking that one can wave one's arms and fly, that one has grown a lion's head, or that one's head is made of glass, where one's having the sense that one can fly, has grown a lion's head, or one's head is made of glass does not involve a phenomenological awareness of one's actually flying, actually having a lion's head, or actually having a head made of glass, and one's having such a sense is not evidence that one is in the state that one ascribes to oneself.

When one believes on the basis of introspection that one is in one of the sorts of states that 1 describes, one typically is right. When one believes on the basis of introspection that one is in one of the sorts of states that 2 describes, one typically is wrong. Consider:

- 3 There are still other states, like thinking that one is the brightest member of one's class, the most talented actor in one's school, an immortal soul, someone who will die today, and the like, where one's having the sense that one is brightest, most talented, immortal, or will die today does not involve a phenomenological awareness of one's actually being brightest, most talented, immortal, or dying today, and one's having such a sense is not evidence that one is in the state that one ascribes to oneself.

In these cases, in contrast to those described in 2 it is not just obvious that one is not in the state mentioned. But the cases are similar in this respect: the state in question, unlike those mentioned in 1, is not a state that is introspectively accessible or discernible. One cannot, so to speak, read off one's introspective awareness that one is in the sort of states described in 2 and 3. Nor is there any entailment between seeming to be in the state and being in the state or any relation such that seeming to be in the state renders it more likely than not that one is in the state.

Consider, then, this way of putting the argument:

- A Enlightenment experiences are senses of being in a certain state and they fall into either class 2 or class 3.
- B Senses of being in a certain state that fall into either class 2 or class 3 are not evidence that the person who has that sense is in that state.

Thus:

- C Enlightenment experiences are not evidence that the person who has them is in the state she thinks she is in.

Hence appeal to enlightenment experience will not confirm Advaita, Jain, or Buddhist doctrine.

Conclusion

If the arguments just considered are correct, what has been established is the following. Consider the crucial steps in the reasoning that must be correct if enlightenment experience provides evidence for religious belief. As we noted earlier, they are:

- A2* If moksha experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's identity with qualityless Brahman) have occurred, this is evidence that one is identical to qualityless Brahman.
- J2* If kevala experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's existential independence or ontological security and one's omniscience) have occurred, then this is evidence that one is existentially independent or has ontological security and one is omniscient.
- T2* If nirvana experiences (in which one at least appears to realize one's nature as composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements) have occurred, then this is evidence that one is composed at a time of momentary elements and over time of a series of bundles of such elements.

If the arguments just considered are correct, then there is no such thing as one's experientially appearing to be qualityless, indestructible, or momentary. What there is are experiences in which one "has a feeling of being qualityless or indestructible or momentary" – believes oneself to be such where one's belief is associated with certain feelings. This is quite distinct from a case in which one is aware of having a particular quality or being in a particular state that is not a belief-state or a feeling-state. That one is in an enlightenment belief-state or feeling-state is not the same as being aware of being in the state that the associated religious tradition says that you are in or having the quality that the associated religious tradition says that you have. Nor is being in such a belief-state or feeling-state itself any evidence that one is in the state that the associated religious tradition says that you are in or having the quality that the associated religious tradition says that you have.

A caveat

While the arguments presented thus far have a certain force, and are eminently defensible, they do not discuss the actual contexts in which one finds the other side presented. In discussing these matters still further, it will be useful to consider first the Advaita Vedanta appeal to experience as evidence, and then the Jain and the Buddhist appeals. The critique of the Advaita appeal that one finds readymade in Indian thought is straightforward and decisive. The latter two appeals in particular are very like positions taken outside of any religious context, and are best seen in a cross-cultural context.

Advaita appeal to enlightenment experience

Shankara rightly held that we do know that we exist and that we have certain properties. Chandra can know that he now exists, and that he is conscious now – and thus he can know that For all X, if X lacks properties, then X is not me. Further, Chandra can know that there are things that he does not know, and if there cannot be things that Brahman does not know (and this is supposed to be a necessary truth – at least it is supposed to be a necessary truth that “not knowing something” cannot be properly ascribed to Brahman), then Chandra can know that he is not identical to Brahman. If one knows both I exist, and have P and There is an item – namely, X – that (if it exists) lacks P, then one can properly infer to I am not X. Hence the Advaita Vedanta claim – its reading of the Upanishadic passage “Thou art That” – is not true. Similarly, on Shankara’s own view, if Chandra sees an elephant, Chandra sees a mind-independently existing large grey or albino mammal, so there are mind-independently existing large grey or albino mammals. But Brahman is not any sort of mammal at all, and so even if Brahman exists, Brahman does not exist alone.

Shankara is of course aware of such objections, and while Ramanuja, Madhva, and other Vedantins make them because they believe that Shankara has no adequate answer, the answer that he has should be noted. The answer¹⁴ is that enlightenment experience trumps or “sublates” all other sorts of experience, and enlightenment experience is self-authenticating. Further, each sensory or introspective experience is self-defeating, because it is either subject/consciousness/object or else subject/content in structure – it includes “the making of distinctions” – and any such experience is (it is claimed) inherently unreliable. Such later critics as Ramanuja and Vadarija turn the latter claim against its author. In moksha or enlightenment experience, one is supposed to learn that one is identical to qualityless Brahman. While this is not viewed as being like learning that seven and five are twelve, or that Alaska and Hawaii are US states – it is an experience said to be life-changing, transforming, accompanied with calm and bliss and freedom from desire, and the like – still it is a matter of coming to see some alleged truth. Enlightenment experience is supposed to confirm core Advaita doctrine. Suppose it does so; then it is a matter of someone learning something – a subject/consciousness/object or else a subject/content experience. If all experiences with such structures are unreliable, so is enlightenment experience. On the other hand, if enlightenment experience is reliable, then other experiences possessing a similar structure can be reliable, and all sensory and introspective experience provides evidence against the claim that only qualityless Brahman exists. Should it be replied that enlightenment experience has no object and no content, then it cannot be the case that it confirms some doctrine rather than some other. “Contentless and objectless experience” describes no possible experience, and if it did describe any experience, such an experience would not be evidence for Advaita versus Jain, Buddhist, monotheistic, or other religious claims.

Jain-type appeals to experience

Both Jain and Buddhist traditions appeal to introspective experience as evidence for, or confirmation of, their particular doctrines of what a person is. From a Jain perspective, “introspective experience” here means “self-awareness” or “awareness of one’s mental states,” irrespective of how those states are elicited or understood. Jain enlightenment experience is taken to have the same structure, and to reveal the same substantial being, that is encountered in ordinary everyday self-consciousness. The Buddhist tradition typically takes ordinary self-awareness to be deceptive and restricts its appeal to enlightenment experiences and experiences that occur to those trained in meditative traditions. Philosophers – of whom David Hume is the most famous – claim that the most ordinary of introspective experiences confirm the same view as that which the Buddhist derives from esoteric experiences. In what follows, then, we will simply speak of introspective experiences, not limiting ourselves to those which are meditative or religious. As the dispute is cross-cultural, we may as well see it in that context, quoting both European and Indian representatives of both positions. One position is propounded by Descartes, various Jain texts, and Ramanuja, and the other asserted by David Hume and various Theravada Buddhist texts.

The dispute here concerns, then, whether or not persons are self-conscious and enduring substances. This matter, at least, Descartes, Ramanuja, Jainism, Buddhism, and Hume think can be settled by appeal to introspection. They disagree as to what the introspective evidence confirms. We begin with the position that claims that introspection and enlightenment experience clearly and incontrovertibly shows that persons are enduring mental substances, and follow with the position that introspection and/or enlightenment experience clearly and incontrovertibly shows that persons at a time are but bundles of momentary states, so that over time a person can be nothing more substantial than a series of such bundles.

The duration problem

It is impossible for one to tell by immediate awareness at time T that one is, or is not, something that does, or does not, endure beyond T. Descartes emphasizes this: he knows by immediate awareness that he exists now – that “I am, I exist, is . . . true each time that I pronounce it, or that I mentally conceive it.” Appeal to memory is required. There are obvious problems in appealing to memory to establish one’s own lack of endurance, but for present purposes we shall simply set aside reference to duration and lack of duration and consider only the idea that either the Jain sort of appeal to experience can establish that persons are mental substances or the Buddhist sort of appeal to experience can confirm that persons are individual states.¹⁵

Descartes

Descartes writes:

of a surety I myself did exist since I persuaded myself of something (or merely because I thought of something). But there is some deceiver or other, very powerful and very cunning, who ever employs his ingenuity in deceiving me. Then without doubt I exist also if he deceives me, and let him deceive me as much as he will, he can never cause me to be nothing so long as

I think that I am something, so that after having reflected well and carefully examined all things, we must come to the definite conclusion that this proposition: I am, I exist, is necessarily true each time that I pronounce it, or that I mentally conceive it.¹⁶

The claim is that Necessarily, the fact that I think includes the fact of my existence and that I can know without danger of error that I am a thinking being and that I exist. Descartes does not make the false claim that Descartes exists is, if true, then necessarily true. In his investigations of self-consciousness he “was merely investigating these properties of which I was able to attain to sure and evident knowledge”¹⁷ – in particular such properties as pertain to the nature of Descartes as a sample person. He claims that he, as a person, is a self-conscious substance, and that this is introspectively evident. It is logically impossible that he exist without being a self-conscious being, and hence being a self-conscious being is at least part of his essence. He adds that since this is true of him as a representative person, what it is to be a person is to be an enduring self-conscious substance.

Two sorts of claims are represented here. One sort is introspective, strictly speaking; Descartes is aware of his thinking of the nature of persons rather than reflecting about triangularity, logical necessity, the nature of matter, or the prospects of his completing a letter to Elizabeth. Discerning what one is thinking about is a matter of being aware of one’s thoughts – a matter of introspection. Another sort is conceptual and metaphysical – he is considering the nature of persons rather than wondering how his mother is doing or considering what to have for dinner, and by doing such conceptual thinking he can discern the nature of persons – just as, in thinking about triangles, he can discern their essence. In this special case, he holds, he has (as anyone can have) a unique advantage – what he considers the essence of is also an object of direct awareness and thus the concept of essence can be compared with something that has the essence the concept expresses. Thus his claim is that these two sorts of thinking – introspective and conceptual – to some degree coalesce in the case of his deliberate use of self-awareness as a source of knowledge regarding his nature as a person. He observes in himself not only his thinking and his existence but also a necessary connection between the property Descartes thinking now and the property Descartes existing now that eliminates any need for inference from the fact that he has the one property to the fact that he has the other (though of course that inference is proper). He is able to reflect that he exists only if he is a self-conscious thing – permanent loss of self-consciousness is also cessation of his existence; and he is directly aware of himself as a self-conscious substance.

Put differently, Descartes is often aware of his being in certain introspective states. Some of these states are states of abstract thought, and among these are reflections concerning the nature of persons. When he thinks of triangles, bluebirds, or waffles, Descartes is thinking of kinds of things to which he does not himself belong. Not so when he thinks of persons. When he thinks about the nature of a triangle – what it is to be one, or of a bluebird or a waffle, he does not think about his own nature; not so when he thinks of what it is to be a person. His view is that he can learn what it is to be a person by (i) noting what sorts of properties he himself has – something introspectively accessible to him, and (ii) reflecting about what properties he could exist without having and what properties he could not exist without having – something conceptually accessible to him.

Explaining his position in reply to an objection, Descartes says:

Everything in which there resides immediately, as in a subject, or by means of which there exists anything that we perceive, i.e. any property, quality, or attribute, of which we have a real idea, is called a Substance.¹⁸

Since he is aware of himself as having various qualities and being in various states, he is introspectively aware of being a substance. Since allegedly he knows that it is his essence to be self-conscious – he could survive without any other features not identical to or entailed by self-consciousness; without self-consciousness,¹⁹ he does not exist – he concludes that it is his nature as a person (and hence the nature of persons) to be a self-conscious substance.

Jainism

A Jain text tells us the following:

The distinctive characteristic of a substance is being. Being is a simultaneous possession of coming into existence, going out of existence, and permanence. Permanence means the indestructibility of the essence of the substance . . . substance is possessed of attributes and modifications. . . . attributes depend upon substratum and cannot be the substratum of another attribute. Modification is change of attribute.²⁰

A substance, we are told, has attributes – properties or qualities, if you please. No attribute can exist that is not the attribute of some substance. Things come into existence in the sense that substances come to have qualities they did not have and to lose qualities they did have; through such changes, substances continue to exist and of course retain their essential qualities. Further:

The self's essence is life . . . The distinctive characteristic of self is attention . . . Those with minds are knowers.²¹

"Selves are substances"²² and their definitive characteristic or essence is described as "life" and "attention." Further:

That which should be grasped by self-discrimination is "from the real point of view."²³ "The soul has the nature of knowledge, and the realization of this nature is Nirvana; therefore one who is desirous of Nirvana must meditate on self-knowledge."²⁴

Jainism sometimes uses nirvana rather than kevala to refer to enlightenment experience. Self-realization involves self-knowledge, and it "has the nature of knowledge." This obviously comes very close at least to Descartes's view of the person, mind, or soul as being a self-conscious substance. In both introspective and enlightenment experience, one appears to oneself as a thinking thing, a substance that possesses cognitive mental qualities.

Ramanuja

In a passage that expresses the same sort of view as that of Descartes and Jainism, the Hindu monotheist Ramanuja writes:

The judgment "I am conscious" reveals an "I" distinguished by consciousness; and to declare that it refers only to a state of consciousness – which is a mere attribute – is no better than to say of the judgment "Devadatta carries a stick" is about the stick only.²⁵

He adds:

Consciousness is the illuminating, in the present moment, to its own substrate, by its own existence alone . . . Or else, it is the establishing of its own subject by its own existence alone . . . A conscious act is the illumination of a particular object to its own substrate by its own existence alone . . . The nature of consciousness is to make something into an object of experience of its own substrate through its own being alone.²⁶

According to Ramanuja, a person can be directly aware of herself as the subject of her experiences, including an awareness of herself. Seeing a lamp, one can be aware of oneself as so seeing. One need not infer from Someone is seeing a lamp to I am someone or I am seeing a lamp. The same experience yields the information that both of these sentences express, and it is Someone is seeing a lamp that requires inference if anything does, for it abstractly expresses a consequence of one's concrete first-person experience.

Ramanuja makes his allegiance to a Cartesian doctrine of the person plain when he writes:

Now the permanence of the producer [of conscious acts], and the origination, duration, and cessation, as for pleasure and pain, of what is known as the conscious act, which is an attribute of the producer, are directly perceived. The permanence of the producer is established by recognition from such judgments as This is the very same thing previously known by me.²⁷

The first sentence of this passage appeals to direct perception. Only in the second sentence is there appeal to argument, and the argument infers from reliable memory to the endurance of oneself as a substance.²⁸

Nor, in Ramanuja's view, is this nature as a self-conscious being lost in enlightenment. Ramanuja waxes eloquent on the point:

To maintain that the consciousness of the "I" does not persist in the state of final release is again altogether inappropriate. It, in fact, amounts to the doctrine – only expressed in somewhat different words – that final release is the annihilation of the self. The "I" is not a mere attribute of the self so that even after its destruction the essential nature of the self might persist – as it persists on the cessation of ignorance; but it constitutes the very nature of the self. Such judgments as: "I know," "Knowledge has arisen in me," show, on the other hand, that we are conscious of knowledge as a mere attribute of the self. – Moreover, a man who, suffering pain, mental or of other kind – whether such pain be real or due to error only – puts himself in relation to pain – "I am suffering pain" – naturally begins to reflect how he may once for all free himself from all these manifold afflictions and enjoy a state of untroubled ease; the desire of final release thus having arisen in him he at once sets to work to accomplish it. If, on the other hand, he were to realize that the effect of such activity would be the loss of personal existence, he surely would turn away as soon as somebody began to tell him about "release" . . . Nor must you maintain against this that even in the state of release there persists pure consciousness; . . . No sensible person exerts himself under the influence of the idea that after he himself has perished there will remain some entity termed "pure light"! – What constitutes the "inward" self thus is the "I," the knowing subject.²⁹

A similar theme is expressed in this passage:

"May I, freeing myself from all pain, enter on free possession of endless delight?" This is the thought which prompts the man desirous of release to apply himself to the study of the sacred texts. Were it a settled matter that release consists in the annihilation of the "I," the man would move away as soon as release were only hinted at. "When I myself have perished, there persists some consciousness different from me," to bring this about nobody truly will exert himself.³⁰

The "permanence" referred to here, like that of the Jain and unlike that of the Cartesian doctrine, is everlasting; like the Cartesian doctrine, and unlike the Jain, Ramanuja holds the permanence to be possessed only by divine courtesy and dependent on divine grace. In addition to an insistence on the distinctness, endurance, and value of the individual person or self, Ramanuja refers us to the nature of conscious experience as a basis for the view that a person is a mental substance in yet another passage:

Some things – e.g., staffs and bracelets – appear sometimes as having a separate, independent existence of their own; at other times they present themselves as distinguishing attributes of other things or beings (i.e., of the persons carrying staffs or wearing bracelets). Other entities – e.g., the generic character of cows – have a being only insofar as they constitute the form of substances, and thus always present themselves as distinguishing attributes of those substances . . . The assertion, therefore, that the difference of things is refuted by immediate consciousness is based on the plain denial of a certain form of consciousness, the one namely – admitted by every one – which is expressed by the judgment "This thing is such and such."³¹

The gist of this passage is that experiences that we all have are properly reported by statements of the form I experience an X that has Q where “X” refers to some thing and “Q” to some quality.

Indestructibility aside, then, Descartes, Jainism, and Ramanuja – a French Catholic, an atheistic religious tradition, and a Hindu Vsistadvaita Vedanta monotheist – hold that introspective (and for Jainism and Ramanuja, enlightenment) experience confirms that persons are self-conscious substances that endure through time. In briefest scope, the idea is this: I am what I appear to be in introspective and enlightenment experience; what I appear to be in introspective and enlightenment experience is this: a mental substance; hence I am a mental substance.

Buddhist-type appeals to experience

David Hume

David Hume writes concerning “all of our particular perceptions” that:

All these are different, and distinguishable, and separable from each other, and may be separately consider'd, and may exist separately, and have no need of any thing to support their existence. After what manner, therefore, do they belong to self; and how are they connected with it? For my part, when I enter most intimately into what I call myself, I always stumble on some particular perception or other, or heat or cold, light or shade, love or hatred, pain or pleasure. I never can catch myself at any time without a perception, and never can observe any thing but the perception. When my perceptions are remov'd for any time, as by sound sleep; so long am I insensible of myself, and may truly be said not to exist. And were all my perceptions remov'd by death, and cou'd I neither think, nor feel, nor see, nor love, nor hate after the dissolution of my body, I shou'd be entirely annihilated, nor do I conceive what is farther requisite to make me a perfect non-entity. If any one upon serious and unprejudic'd reflexion, thinks he has a different notion of himself, I must confess I can reason no longer with him. All I can allow him is, that he may be in the right as well as I, and that we are essentially different in this particular. He may, perhaps, perceive something simple and continuous, which he calls himself; tho' I am certain there is no such principle in me.³²

Hume's claim is that all his introspection yields is awareness of independent states – say, a state of being in pain and a state of wondering where the aspirin went. At another later time, introspection may reveal, say, a desire for fish and wine and a regret that one forgot to buy either. What there are, so far as persons go, are such states, and nothing else. In briefest scope, his line of reasoning goes: I am what I appear to be in introspective experience; what I appear to be in introspective experience is this: individual states; hence I am individual states.

Theravada Buddhism

It is well known that this Humean view is shared by various Buddhist perspectives. A Buddhist text tells us that:

Whether Buddhas arise, O priests, or whether Buddhas do not arise, it remains a fact and the fixed and necessary constitution of being that all its constituents are transitory. This fact a Buddha discovers and masters, and when he has discovered and mastered it, he announces, teaches, publishes, proclaims, discloses, minutely explains, and makes it clear, that all the constituents of being are transitory . . . Whether Buddhas arise, O priests, or whether Buddhas do not arise, it remains a fact and the fixed and necessary constitution of being, that all its elements are lacking in an ego [substantial, permanent self-nature]. This fact a Buddha discovers and masters, and when he has discovered and mastered it, he announces, teaches, publishes, proclaims, discloses, minutely explains, and makes it clear, that all the elements of being are lacking in an ego.³³

A longer and more familiar passage reads as follows:

Just as the word "chariot" is but a mode of expression for axle, wheels, chariot-body, pole, and other constituent members, placed in a certain relation to each other, but when we come to examine the members one by one, we discover that in the absolute sense there is not chariot; and just as the word "house" is but a mode of expression for wood and other constituents of a house, surrounding space in a certain relation, but in the absolute sense there is no house; and just as the word "fist" is but a mode of expression for the fingers, the thumb, etc. in a certain relation; and the word "lute" for the body of the lute, strings, etc.; "army" for elephants, horses, etc.; "city" for fortifications, houses, gates, etc.; “tree” for trunk, branches, foliage, etc.; in a certain relation, but when we come to examine the parts one by one, we discover that in the absolute sense there is no tree; in exactly the same way words “living entity” and “ego” are but a mode of expression for the presence of the five attachment groups, but when we come to examine the elements of being one by one, we discover that in the absolute sense there is no living entity there to form a basis for such figments as “I am” or “I”; in other words, that in the absolute sense there is only name and form. The insight of him who perceives this is called knowledge of the truth.³⁴

In brief, the line of reasoning is this: I am what I appear to be in enlightenment experience; what I appear to be in enlightenment experience is this: individual states; hence I am individual states.

These Buddhist passages express the doctrine that Hume claims to derive from introspective experience and that Theravada (and other) Buddhist traditions believe to be confirmed in meditative and enlightenment experience. The gist of the passages is put more succinctly via the terse claim “Consciousness is soulless.”³⁵ Hume takes each mental state – each perception, or impression and idea, as he says – to exist independent of every other. The Buddhist traditions hold that each mental state depends for its existence on other states. But this difference aside, they agree – persons at a time are bundles of momentary states, over time are a series of such bundles, and introspective and/or enlightenment experience teaches us this sort of view.

The contrasting arguments

The enduring-mental-substance view and the bundle-of-momentary-states view do agree on an important and controversial claim, namely that what we appear to be in introspective, meditative, or enlightenment experience is what we are. It is not obvious that this is so. John Locke, in Book Two of his Essay Concerning Human Understanding, offers an interesting third view. He agrees with Hume and Buddhism that what we are aware of is momentary states. He holds that momentary states can exist only as states of enduring substances. So he accepts the description of introspective data given by the momentary-mental-state theorist and the conclusion held by the enduring-mental-substance theorist, and there is at least nothing obviously incoherent about this view. It is incoherent if one thinks that what we are is exactly what introspection (etc.) reveals; but Locke does not hold that. Further, of course the view that we are simply what appears to, or in, our introspective, meditative, or enlightenment experience is not something that is introspectively (etc.) confirmable. Further, if one denies that we are only what appears to, or in, our introspective (etc.) experience one does not embrace a self-contradictory doctrine. Still further, we have lots of tendencies, habits, dispositions, and properties that are not introspectively (etc.) available to us – some (like our ability to make logical inferences) are not always introspectively accessible, since we are not always making inferences; some, like either our being indestructible or our not being indestructible, are not ever introspectively available. Since the view that we are what we introspectively seem to be is common to both sides of the dispute, and an important part of their appeal to experience, both are – to that important degree at any rate – mistaken. That assumption is false.

One might revise the claim regarding introspection (etc.) to claim merely that whatever structure the self seemed to introspection (etc.) to have, or whatever fundamental sort it seemed to introspection to belong, was the structure it had or the kind to which it belonged. But belonging to a kind is not the sort of property that is introspectively discernible; if persons are essentially self-conscious, and to be self-conscious is the nature of persons, it still does not follow that self-consciousness being the nature of persons is somehow introspectively accessible. Similarly, if one has a triangular image before the mind's eye, and being closed and three-sided is essential to a triangle, it does not follow that being closed and three-sided is essential to a triangle are part of one's image. Neither self-consciousness being the nature of persons nor being closed and three-sided is the nature of triangles is an introspectively (etc.) accessible quality.

It is crucial here that Descartes used both introspective report and conceptual consideration. So did Locke: so also do Ramanuja, Hume, and the Jain and Buddhist traditions. The substantialists – Descartes, Ramanuja, and the Jain tradition – take it to be true that it is logically impossible that there be mental states that are not the states of some person in the sense of being states of some mental substance. Here Locke, who describes his experience in Humean and Buddhist terms, agrees with Descartes, Ramanuja, and the Jains. For Jainism, Descartes, and Ramanuja, what introspection yields is not a pain, but one's being in pain; not a (or the) thought that Abraham Lincoln was once US President, but one's thinking that Lincoln was President; not hunger, but one's being hungry. It is oneself-in-somestate that is introspected. The Buddhist tradition typically takes this to be a correct account of ordinary introspection, and to that extent agrees with the substantialists against Hume. Hence their appeal to meditative and enlightenment experience which they take to be different.

Hume takes persons to be, at a time, merely bundles of states. He takes introspection to reveal this, whereas the Buddhist tradition agrees with Hume's doctrine while taking his description of introspection to be true only of meditative and enlightenment experiences. These experiences have been, on the Buddhist view, purified from mistaken notions and, from the Jain view, rendered evidentially worthless by importation of Buddhist assumptions and made unnatural and non-representative of reliable human experience.

It is tempting to offer this explanation of the differences. Each perspective offers its reports of what experience teaches on report forms constructed in their own shops, substantival forms from the Jain shop and non-substantival forms from the Buddhist shop. What makes this possible regarding introspective experience and the dispute at hand is a variety of things we have noted already – the dispute is not a dispute about introspectively accessible properties or states, and it is a dispute inherently involving contrary philosophical theses. The Buddhist tradition is unwilling to rest the case on appeal to introspective or sensory experience because it thinks that this would refute its own position. It thus appeals to experiences that occur in meditative and enlightenment contexts of the right sort – e.g., not of the Jain sort. This involves a move not unlike the Advaita appeal to moksha experience as trumping others, unless Hume is right about introspective experience after all.

The problem with both the appeal-to-experience of the substantivalists and of the non-substantivalists is this: it marks out the dispute on ground that cannot offer evidence regarding it. The problem is not merely that there is no neutral way of describing introspective experience to which one can appeal for evidence that is of any use – though that is true. The problem is that the sorts of properties or states, experience of which would be evidence, are not accessible to introspective experience. Being a substance and being a bundle of states are not more properties or features that are introspectively accessible than are being indestructible or being destructible; both sorts of features differ in that regard from being fatigued or worried or elated.

If appeal to introspectively accessible features are relevant to the dispute, as of course they are, they are relevant by virtue of their connection to competing theories of the self or person. The dispute then switches to the competing theories themselves – to the internal consistency, the coherence, the explanatory power, and so on, of substantival versus non-substantival theories of persons. But that is a different matter from appeal to introspective, meditative, or enlightenment experience as evidence for religious belief. It is a matter of which theory – substantivalist or non-substantivalist – can explain memory, responsibility, self-consciousness, and the like.³⁶ It is not a matter of direct experiential evidence.

Questions for reflection

- 1 Construct and assess an argument for the claim Numinous experience is not self-authenticating regarding the claim that God exists analogous to the one offered above regarding the claim that enlightenment experience is not self-authenticating regarding religious belief.
- 2 Give the best argument you can for the claim Kevala experience provides evidence for Jain belief and then subject it to the best critique that you can offer. What is the result?
- 3 Give the best argument you can for the claim Moksha experience provides evidence for Advaita belief and then subject it to the best critique that you can offer. What is the result?
- 4 Give the best argument you can for the claim Nirvana experience provides evidence for Theravada belief and then subject it to the best critique that you can offer. What is the result?
- 5 Give the best argument you can for the claim Numinous experience provides evidence for monotheistic belief and then subject it to the best critique that you can offer. What is the result?
- 6 Give the best argument you can for the claim Sensory experience provides evidence for belief in the existence of physical objects and then subject it to the best critique that you can offer. What is the result?

Annotated reading

Braddon-Mitchell, David and Jackson, Frank (eds) (1996) Philosophy of Mind and Cognition, Oxford: Blackwell. A good survey of contemporary philosophy of mind.

Chisholm, Roderick (1976) Person and Object, LaSalle, IL: Open Court. Defends a substance account of persons.

Loux, Michael (1997) Metaphysics, London: Routledge. Contains a good discussion of substance-theories and bundle-theories.

Yandell, Keith E. (1990) Hume's "Inexplicable Mystery," Philadelphia: Temple University Press. Contains a detailed discussion of Hume's views.

PART V

Religion, morality, faith,
and reason

CHAPTER 14

Religion and morality

Religious values and moral values

Deterministic views

Compatibilism and incompatibilism

The Principle of Alternative Possibilities

Divine foreknowledge and human freedom

Conclusion

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Religion and morality

Religious values and moral values

Nonmonotheistic traditions

Religious traditions sanction religious values. Advaita Vedanta, Theravada Buddhism, and Jainism find the highest value in the attainment of release from reincarnation and the achieving of enlightenment – first a pre-enlightenment experience in this life which guarantees a later and final enlightenment upon death.

There are various logically possible relationships between moral and religious values. At one extreme, one might hold that the only way to salvation was by trampling moral values under foot or, at the other, that the only way of being morally mature was by way of rejecting all religious values as unworthy. Pursuing either line of reasoning would require a general discussion of the nature of morality. Here a more modest route is taken. Our concern is with what views of morality are available within the religious perspectives already outlined.

A key question to ask in this regard is whether moral values, as conceived by a religious tradition, are taken up into its ultimate religious value. What is of ultimate religious value for a tradition is gaining the proffered cure to its diagnosed illness, or attaining salvation or enlightenment. For Advaita Vedanta, then, however important moral values are at the level of appearance, and however stressed it is in practice that only the morally pure can achieve enlightenment, since morality has no place or purchase on a qualityless Brahman, the ultimate religious value – realization of identity with qualityless Brahman, recognition of an identity alleged always to have held – has no moral content. Moral virtue is at best a means to the achievement of an amoral religious condition.

Theravada Buddhism construes the achievement of nirvana either as annihilation altogether or at least as involving the loss of anything that would involve the continued existence of an individual person. On this perspective, there is comparatively little to a person at a time, or over time, and it appears that this notion of what individuality amounts to is preparatory to an account on which all individuality is lost.

Here, too, then, final enlightenment has no moral content – indeed, perhaps, no content period. Thus, however nice individual or typical Theravada Buddhists, or Advaita Vedantins, may be, and whatever the morally relevant effects of their respective traditions in the cultures that they influence, it seems true that ultimate religious value has, for these traditions, no place for any sort of intrinsic moral value.

Jainism is more complex in this regard. In Jain enlightenment, personal identity is retained, and there is no reason to deny that what sort of person, morally speaking, one has been may enter into one's status in final enlightenment – may, so to say, flavor the enlightenment experience in one way or another. Thus while following a strict code is required here, as in Theravada and Advaita, in order to achieve enlightenment, in Jainism alone of these alternatives is it possible to contend that one's moral character now somehow carries over into one's condition in enlightenment, for only in Jainism is there anything in the condition of enlightenment to which moral properties might belong or which might possess moral character.

Monotheistic traditions

If God is conceived as a moral agent, as is frequent but not universal among monotheists, then God's existence is the highest moral value and the core of morality relative to created persons is their being made in the image of God and their achieving their positive potential by imitation of God. A highly plausible view of morality takes moral principles¹ to be, if true, then necessarily true. Monotheists who suppose God exists to be a logically necessary truth can take the necessary truth of true moral principles to be grounded in divine cognitive states; monotheists who view God exists as contingently true can ground necessarily true moral principles in abstract objects that possess logically necessary existence.² On both views, if a moral principle is true, it is true whether God creates or not. A moral principle, being conditional – of the form possessed by If X is a person then X ought to be respected, for example – will be true under all possible conditions, including those in which God does not create. On both views, there will be persons³ to whom moral principles apply only if God creates them.

It is sometimes argued that God cannot be said to be morally good in the same sense in which human beings – say, St Paul – are said to be good. Two arguments often given for this view are:

Argument 1

- 1 God is good is a necessary truth.
- 2 St Paul is good, even if true, is a contingent truth.
- 3 If "X" in "Y is X" is used in a sentence expressing a necessary truth, and "X" in "Z is X" is used in a sentence expressing a contingent truth, then "X" as used in the one sentence bears a different meaning than does "X" as used in the other sentence. Hence:
- 4 "Good" as used in "God is good" has a different meaning than does "good" in "St Paul is good."

The problem with this argument is that the principle expressed in premise 3 is false. Consider the sentences "Three is odd" and "The number of coins on the table is odd." The proposition expressed by the first of these sentences is a necessary truth, and the proposition expressed by the second of these sentences is, if true at all, a contingent truth. But "odd" means the same in both cases. Hence premise 3 is false.

The other line of reasoning is that if God is good, still God can do things, and allow things, without ceasing to be good, that no human being could do, or allow,⁴ without ceasing to be good. Jill, if she allows a person to suffer terribly when she could easily stop it, or causes someone to die even though her family needs her desperately, is not a good person. God, if God exists, at least allows such things all the time without ceasing to be called good. So "good" must mean something else in heaven than on earth.

This argument ignores the fact that ascriptions of goodness ultimately rest on motives, intentions, ends, and – in the end – character. Two persons, of equally good character, can act differently if their knowledge and powers differ, and greatly differently if their knowledge and powers differ greatly. A man on a train who is in sudden need of a delicate operation will rightly react differently to the idea of a skilled surgeon performing the operation immediately and a sincere lawyer with a knife and good intentions attempting to perform the same operation. Presumably the surgeon may, and perhaps ought, to operate; the lawyer ought to go get help. The claim that God is good is the claim that God's motives, ends, intentions, and character resemble those of a good human person, allowing for difference in knowledge and power. The range of things that God can allow and bring good out of thus vastly exceeds those available to any human being. Especially relevant in this regard is the monotheistic view that while a person's death ends our ability to affect them, it makes no difference to God's power to affect them. So this argument too fails.

Deterministic views

Fatalism: determinism based on logical necessity

Fatalism is the view that these two things are true:

- 1 Every truth is a necessary truth.
- 2 Every falsehood is a necessary falsehood.

If one holds that God exists, and is a fatalist, one will think that God exists is a necessary truth and also that it, plus various necessary truths about God's nature, will explain other necessary truths about the existence and history of the world.

There can be no such thing as explaining why a particular necessary truth N is true rather than false – its having been false is logically impossible and there is no need to eliminate a non-possibility. There is no possibly being false to rule out. One can put the point here by contrasting a necessary truth like Even an omnipotent being cannot fiat the actions of a libertarianly free person and a contingent truth like Boston's National Basketball franchise is named the Celtics. The necessary truth concerning omnipotence and freedom can be explained by making its meaning clear; a detailed explanation of libertarian freedom is offered later in this chapter. But explaining the truth of a necessary truth amounts either to giving an account of its sense or offering an account of necessary truth generally – a theory of necessity such as Necessary truths are grounded in abstract objects. Neither of these is a matter of describing some conditions that might have obtained and the obtaining of which would make the necessary truth in question false. There are no such conditions. The contingent truth about the Celtics can be explained in terms of the history of the franchise; what makes it true is a series of events that might never have occurred, so this explanation is a matter of accounting for the fact that it is true rather than false. Even, then, if one is a fatalist – in which case one will deny that there are any logically contingent truths or falsehoods – it is baffling how the truth of one necessary truth could explain the truth of another.

Nonetheless, setting this problem aside, consider a monotheistic version of fatalism. On this view, Necessarily, God exists is true, as are each of the following: *Necessarily, God has all and only those properties definitive of God's nature; Necessarily, God's choices are entirely determined by God's nature; Necessarily, whatever is true is true because God chose that it be true.*⁵ Then consider the consequences.

One consequence is that God's existence and nature entirely determine God's choices, which in turn determine everything else. But it is, by hypothesis, logically impossible that God not exist or that God not have the nature that God has. So it is logically impossible that any true proposition is not true or that any proposition that is not true was true. The right way to think of the sort of scenario described is in terms of an axiomatic system in which all the theorems follow by rules of inference from the axioms; the axioms are necessary truths, the rules of inference truth preserving, and so the theorems are also necessary truths. The first consequence, then, would be this: if a theologically based logical fatalism were true: every truth a necessary truth, every falsehood a contradiction, then the actual world also the only world possible.

Another consequence is that there would be at most one agent. Suppose that Tess and Tricia are related as follows. Tess has her own thought life, but Tricia thinks only when and what Tess deliberately, specifically causes her to think. Tess can act without Tricia, but Tricia acts only if Tess causes her to act. In fact, every feeling, mental image, dream, movement, attitude, pain, or pleasure Tricia experiences, Tess deliberately, specifically causes her to experience. Tess knows her power over Tricia, but Tricia is ignorant of it. Finally, this relationship between Tess and Tricia is one neither can break; its roots lie deep in the laws of nature. It is logically possible that Tess and Tricia not be so related, but only logically possible. Under these circumstances, however things seem to Tricia, she is not an agent; she does not act on her own, think on her own, feel on her own. But on the scenario with which we began, God is, so to speak, related to whatever persons there are (or appear to be), as Tess is related to Tricia, only more so; here the roots of the relationship lie deep in the nature of a necessarily existing God and in the laws of logic. It is not even logically possible that God not be so related to any persons there may be, or appear to be. Indeed, on the scenario being considered, there is at most one person. On it, God is related to Tess in such a manner that her existence as well as her thoughts, feelings, and actions are entirely determined by God's existence and nature. It is no more logically possible that God exist and Tess not than it is logically possible that Tess exist and God not; God exists, on the scenario in question, entails Tess exists, and since the former is, by hypothesis, a necessary truth, so is the latter.⁶ Thus Tess exists also entails God exists. Tess is not a person distinct from God; she is at most, as Spinoza would put it, a mode – a state – of God's.⁷ It is not logically possible that "her" existence and "her" properties, thoughts, and actions exist without God's existing and having the nature that God possesses; the divine existence and nature determine "her" existence and properties in such a way that it is logically impossible that they be otherwise than as they are. In such a world, morality would be impossible. Even if we suppose that Tess is a person, it would be logically impossible that she or anyone act other than as they did, think other than as they did, feel other than as they did. Any suggestion to the effect that anyone might have acted, thought, or felt at some time other than as they did think, act, or feel at that time would be self-contradictory. If all truths were necessary truths, there would be no way things could be other than the way things were. The notions of responsibility and obligation, guilt and innocence, freedom and agency, all presuppose at least the logical possibility of alternatives. Logical fatalism is true and There are moral agents are logically incompatible propositions; while there is not much controversy concerning this point, there is considerable controversy regarding what sort of world it is within which agents can exist who are free in the sense required if they are to be morally responsible for their choices and actions.

This discussion of monotheistic fatalism raises some interesting questions regarding what is to come. If it is clear that the absence of logically possible alternatives entails the absence of freedom, is there any good reason to think the absence of all but counterfactual alternatives – alternatives available in other possible worlds but not in the real world, alternatives “available” only in a sense compatible with the actions actually performed being in fact inevitable – does not also entail the absence of freedom? If it is true that there is but one agent in a fatalistic monotheistic world, is there any good reason to think that there is more than one agent in a deterministic world?

Determinism not based on logical necessity

Let a tensed universal description (TUD) be an accurate statement of everything that is true in the world at a given time. Each such description should be viewed as tensed to some specific time that is specified in the description. Let LN be a correct account of all of the laws of nature, and LL a correct account of all of the laws of logic. Then determinism holds: For any TUD tensed earlier than time t , that TUD plus LN plus LL, entails any TUD tensed to time t or later. Thus, if determinism is true, the past determines a unique future. There are logical possibilities alternative to what happens at any given time; it is simply not compatible with the laws of logic, the laws of nature, and what has happened in the past that they be realized. So they will not happen, and there is no more that we can do about that than there is we can do about the truth of the laws of logic, the laws of nature, or what happened in the past.

Compatibilism and incompatibilism

Compatibilism holds that it is logically possible that determinism be true and that persons have the sort of freedom that is required for them to be morally responsible for their choices and actions. The opposite position to compatibilism is incompatibilism, which holds that it is not logically possible (non-contradictory) that determinism be true and that persons have the sort of freedom that is required for them to be morally responsible for their choices and actions.

Libertarianism⁸

Libertarianism holds that incompatibilism is true and determinism is false; in order for persons to have the sort of freedom that is required for them to be morally responsible for their choices and actions they must have genuine freedom, not compatibilist so-called freedom, regarding those choices and actions. Libertarians hold that persons do have this sort of freedom. Compatibilists are dubious that there is even possibly any sort of freedom beyond that which they affirm. The notion of libertarian freedom, often called categorical freedom, runs as follows.

(CF) Jane is categorically (or libertarianly) free with respect to lying at T entails Jane's lying is within her power at T and Jane's refraining from lying is within her power at T.

In turn:

(CFa) Jane's lying is within her power at T entails Jane's lying at T does not require that Jane falsify some total universal description (TUD) tensed to a time earlier than T, make some law of nature false, or make some law of logic false;

and

(CFb) Jane's refraining from lying is within her power at T entails Jane's refraining from lying at T does not require that Jane falsify some TUD tensed to a time earlier than T, make some law of nature false, or make some law of logic false.

(CF) is to be understood as containing the definitions provided by (CFa) and (CFb).

Relations between the positions

It may be helpful in understanding these alternatives to see some of their relationship laid out.

- 1 One can consistently be a determinist and an incompatibilist.
- 2 One can consistently be a determinist and a compatibilist.
- 3 One cannot consistently be a determinist and a libertarian.
- 4 One cannot consistently be an incompatibilist and a compatibilist.
- 5 Being a libertarian entails being an incompatibilist.
- 6 Being an incompatibilist does not entail being a libertarian.
- 7 Being a compatibilist does not entail being a determinist.

Monotheistic determinism and monotheistic libertarianism

A fundamental dispute within monotheism concerns whether possession of compatibilist freedom yields a world sufficiently different from (monotheistic?) logical fatalism to allow for there to be human agents who are morally responsible for their thoughts and actions. Libertarian monotheists think that if the only sort of freedom human persons have is so-called compatibilist freedom then God is cause of whatever evils our thoughts and actions involve. Or they think that God is the only agent, and that human personhood is mere appearance. Compatibilist monotheists disagree. If compatibilism is false, then of course monotheists ought to reject it. There is an interesting and powerful argument against compatibilism.

An argument against compatibilism

Consider the TUD that is tensed to the time just before the last dinosaur died; let that be TUDdino. Then suppose that you will decide to have a cup of coffee at 3:00 this afternoon; let the TUD tensed to that time be TUDcup; TUDcup, of course, includes a statement to the effect that you decide to have a cup of coffee at 3:00. If determinism is true, then:

- 1 TUDdino and LL and LN entails TUDcup.
- 2 One is not responsible for anything that one has no control over.
- 3 One has no control over anything that is entailed by what one has no control over.

- 4 One is not responsible for anything that is entailed by what one has no control over (from 2, 3).
- 5 You have no control over what is true in TUDdino.
- 6 You have no control over what the laws of logic are.
- 7 You have no control over what the laws of nature are.
- 8 You have no control over TUDdino and LL and LN (from 5–7).
- 9 You have no control over what TUDdino and LL and LN entails (from 4, 8).
- 10 You have no control over TUDcup (from 1, 9).
- 11 TUDcup entails You decide to have coffee at 3:00.
- 12 You have no control over whether you decide to have coffee at 3:00 (from 10, 11).

Note that you and your decision/action “stand in” here for everyone and every one of everyone’s decisions/actions. So what follows is that if determinism is true then no one is ever responsible for any decision/action. Hence compatibilism, which claims otherwise, is false.⁹ Central to controversy over the success of this argument is whether premise 3 – One has no control over anything that is entailed by what one has no control over – is true. This claim is sometimes called the Control Principle.

Explanation and determinism

If determinism is true, then for any TUD true at time T1 it is not merely the case that The TUD true at T1 plus the laws of logic plus the laws of nature entail the TUD true at any later time but that the TUD true at time T1 plus the laws of logic and the laws of nature also explain the truth of the TUD true at time T2, and so on. Even if it is a necessary element in explanation, entailment is not sufficient for explanation. The proposition Either 1 and 3 are 7 or Oklahoma is a state, and 1 and 3 are not 7 entails the proposition Oklahoma is a state, but Oklahoma’s statehood has not been explained.

The notion of an explanation is notoriously difficult, but this much can be said about it. Let us say that If X obtains then Y obtains is true and expresses a law, then there is an X/Y lawlike connection; let us also say that if there is a true non-lawlike proposition of the form If X obtains then an agent with the power to bring about Y will do A then there is an X/Y teleological connection. In order that X obtains explain Y obtains it must be the case that X does indeed obtain, and the case that there is a true proposition that expresses a lawlike or a teleological X/Y connection. Determinism assumes that for every state B that obtains, there is another state A such that A obtains and such that there is a lawlike A/B connection. In order for determinism to be true, the past must not only entail, but also explain, the future by virtue of there always being such lawlike connections.¹⁰

The Control Principle

What is most interestingly controversial about the argument, stated above, against compatibilism concerns the third premise, which states a version of the Control Principle: (CP) One has no control over anything that is entailed by what one has no control over. Is (CP), or some appropriate replacement, true? (CP) tells us this: one may properly infer from Sam has no control over whether A obtains and That A obtains entails that B obtains to Sam has no control over whether B obtains. There are two sorts of objection to (CP).

One is that there are analogous inferences that are not proper. For example, neither of these arguments is valid:

Example 1: Sue is obligated to do A; doing A entails doing B; hence Sue is obligated to do B. (Sue is obligated to wash her dog; washing her dog entails shifting the position of some atoms; hence Sue is obligated to shift the position of some atoms.)¹¹

Example 2: Sue believes that P; that P is true entails that Q is true; hence Sue believes that Q. (Sue believes that figure F is a triangle; that F is a triangle entails that F's interior angles sum to 180 degrees; hence Sue believes that F's interior angles sum to 180 degrees. Sue can believe that F is a triangle but has learned no geometry sufficient for believing anything about what F's interior angles sum to.)

On the other hand, there are analogous inferences that are entirely proper:

Example 3: Necessarily, P entails Q; Necessarily P; hence Necessarily Q.

Example 4: P entails Q; P is true; hence Q is true are valid inferences. Is it with these, or with the previous examples, that the Control Principle is properly compared? That is just the question all over again as to whether the Control Principle is true. No real progress is likely along these lines, either in favor or against the Control Principle. Each party to the dispute will simply put forward examples that exhibit their view of the matter, and claim – neither more nor less cogently than the other – that these are the genuinely parallel cases.

The other and better strategy involves looking very closely at what the Control Principle says and endeavoring to find clear counterexamples to it. Suppose X obtains at time T is necessarily true of some fact X – that seventeen is prime, or that necessary truths are necessarily necessary. (Such facts will obtain at any time you please.) In such a case, X's obtaining, let us say, is logically inevitable. Note that if the occurrence of some state of affairs A is logically inevitable, then A's non-occurrence is logically impossible. Suppose that State of affairs Y obtains at time T2 is contingently true, as is State of affairs X obtains at T1, where T1 is a time before any human being existed and T2 is a time well after the first human beings came to exist. Suppose, finally, that the conjunct (X obtains at T1 and The laws of logic are true and The laws of nature are true and Y does not obtain at T2) is a contradiction. Then let us say that, given X, Y is in fact inevitable. When this is so regarding some state of affairs, let us say that it is in fact inevitable. Note that if state of affairs A is in fact inevitable, then A's non-occurrence is in fact impossible – A does not occur is logically inconsistent with the very complex conjunct composed of the truth about the past, the laws of nature, and the laws of logic. Even the staunchest compatibilist should grant that whether something obtained or not before any human being existed was not something any human being could do anything whatever about, and the same goes for the laws of logic and the laws of nature. Then given things true in our world that we had nothing to do with making true and could not have altered, what occurs now (if determinism is true) is in fact inevitable. So we could do nothing about whether any thing that obtains now did so or not – not even any of our thoughts or actions. What the Control Principle claims is that, regarding things that are either logically or in fact inevitable, and what these things entail,¹² we do not have any control. If determinism is true, whatever occurs is in fact inevitable. So if determinism is true, and the Control Principle is true, there is nothing whatever that we have control over.

Given this understanding of the Control Principle, consider its application to a simple case. Suppose that there is a golden retriever Fairy who makes sure that (R) is true:

(R) Every golden retriever in the world is well fed.

Ruth, who owns a golden retriever, has no control over whether (R) is true or not. Obviously (given that Ruth has a golden retriever) (R) entails:

(GR) Ruth's golden retriever is well fed.

If (R) is true, then Ruth's golden retriever will be fed, whether Ruth feeds him or not. What can be up to Ruth is simply whether or not she feeds him. She can make (GR) true, even though (GR) will be true whether she makes it true or not. What Ruth can have control over, even if (R) is true, is whether is true. There is a distinction to be made between cases in which a proposition will be true whether one so acts as to make it true or not and cases in which a proposition will be true only if one so acts as to make it true. What is in one's control in the former cases is what happens by virtue of which a particular proposition is true – whether it is true by virtue of one's own activities or by virtue of something else; what is in one's control in the latter cases is whether anything at all occurs in virtue of which a particular proposition is true. Let us call instances of the former sort cases of partial control and instances of the latter sort cases of full control.

(RG) It is Ruth who feeds Ruth's golden retriever

Suppose that (R) will be true, whatever Ruth does. Since (R) Every golden retriever in the world is well fed entails (GR) Ruth's golden retriever is well fed, the Control Principle tells us that whether (GR) is true also does not depend on what Ruth does. (RG) It is Ruth who feeds Ruth's golden retriever, however, is not entailed by (R). Given (R) and the Control Principle, the truth of (GR) is not under even Ruth's partial control. Given (R) and (GR), the truth of (RG) can still be under her partial control.

If determinism is true, some truths descriptive of a pre-Ruth past, plus the laws of nature and the laws of logic – what we might call some preRuth package of truths – either entails (RG) or entails not-(RG). This fact, plus the Control Principle, entails that whether (RG) is true or not is also not even in Ruth's partial control.

Suppose determinism is true, and Ruth herself feeds her golden retriever at time T. Then her doing so is in fact inevitable, and her not doing so is in fact impossible. Suppose that determinism is true, and Ruth does not herself feed her golden retriever at time T. Then her not doing so is in fact inevitable and her doing so is in fact impossible. What is in fact impossible for Ruth is not under Ruth's control. So the Control Principle seems correct in its implications regarding Ruth and the feeding of her golden retriever.

It is worth noting what, if determinism is true, the distinction between partial control and full control amounts to. Consider what, if determinism is true, having partial control means. We may as well consider this concretely in terms once again of Ruth and her dog. If determinism is true, then to say that Ruth has partial control regarding whether her dog is fed is to say that the conditional If Ruth does not feed her dog, her dog will be fed is true (the golden retriever Fairy will become active) but either Ruth does feed her dog is in fact inevitably true or Ruth does not feed her dog is in fact inevitably true. If determinism is true, then to say that Ruth has full control regarding whether her dog is fed is to say that the conditional If Ruth does not feed her dog, her dog will be fed is false but either Ruth does feed her dog is in fact inevitably true or Ruth does not feed her dog is in fact inevitably true. If whether her dog is fed or not is in fact inevitable, and whether she feeds it or not is in fact inevitable, it is hard to see how she is free with respect to her dog being fed. Why think that, if determinism is true, anyone is ever free regarding anything?

Compatibilist replies

The natural compatibilist replies to this question amount to this: they find some feature of Ruth that causes Ruth's behavior, and claim that there being a cause of this sort is what it amounts to for Ruth to be free. Suppose Ruth feeds her dog, and her doing so she wants to do, intends to do, and the like. Her body makes all the appropriate dog-feeding movements because of her wants, desires, intentions, and like, and the dog happily eats his dinner. But then Ruth – the compatibilist claims – feeds her dog, and is responsible for doing so. If the sorts of thing she has done are morally right or wrong, she is morally praiseworthy or blameworthy for having done it. So she is free in whatever sense moral responsibility requires.

The incompatibilist, whether she is a libertarian or not, wonders how this can be so, in the light of the considerations previously noted – given that if determinism is true, whatever is done is in fact inevitably done. To answer, compatibilists have to give some account of freedom.

Possibility

It is helpful, in approaching compatibilist accounts of freedom, to highlight three relevant concepts:

Logical inevitability: State of affairs A is logically inevitable if and only if A obtains is a logically necessary truth.

In fact inevitability: State of affairs A is in fact inevitable if and only if A obtains is entailed by the truth about the past, the laws of nature, and the laws of logic.

These notions contrast to:

Causal impossibility: State of affairs A is causally impossible if and only if A obtains only if some law of nature is false.

Compatibilists take it to be possible that a bit of behavior be in fact inevitable and one that one is morally responsible for performing. Compatibilists and incompatibilists typically agree that human beings never perform actions that are logically inevitable or causally impossible. Libertarians deny that human actions are typically in fact inevitable and add that, were they, no one would ever be responsible for them.¹³

Compatibilism and actions versus nonactions

The compatibilist thinks that whether determinism is true or not, and hence even if it is true, we can have the sort of freedom required for moral responsibility. Hence he holds that this sort of freedom regarding some thought or action is compatible with that thought or action being in fact inevitable.

One may be responsible for what one does, but also for what one does not do. A friend who could easily have stopped your progress and knew what would happen if he did not, but nonetheless allowed you to walk into the path of a moving vehicle, is not innocent merely because she did not push you into its path. For simplicity, however, focus here will be on responsibility for what one does. Regarding such responsibility, Karen is responsible for action A entails Karen performed A.

Let Karen's states at time T refer to all of the physical states Karen's body is in at T and all of the mental states her mind is in at T. If determinism is true, each of those states is in fact inevitable, given the content of the past. Let us say that a causal chain passes through Karen at T if and only if at least one of its members is also one of Karen's states at T. If some action by Karen is a member of a causal chain – a chain whose earlier members result in Karen performing that action – let us call it an action chain relative to Karen; for short, an action chain. Any action chain relative to Karen must pass through Karen.

Consider the various sorts of mental states that one can be in that are relevant to how one acts – intentions, purposes, goals, preferences, likes, dislikes, desires, wants, choices, and so on. Let these be action-inclining states. Action-inclining states relative to chewing a stick of gum will include desiring to chew it, intending to chew it, having chewing it as a purpose or a goal, and the like. If a chain passes through Karen but contains no action-inclining state of Karen's, then even if it results in some motions of her body, it is dubious that it is an action chain regarding her. There is a difference between Karen's teeth gnashing and Karen gnashing her teeth, and if determinism being true is compatible with making that distinction between actual cases, presumably the difference will be one between a causal chain passing through Karen that contains none of Karen's action-inclining states (Karen's teeth gnashing) and a causal chain passing through Karen that does contain some action-inclining state of her where the target of that state is her teeth being gnashed together (Karen gnashing her teeth). An action chain relative to Karen's performing action A must pass through Karen in such a way that it contains action-inclining states which are at least partial causes of A. This is one way, perhaps the most natural, for a determinist to endeavor to distinguish between what is, and what is not, an action: actions are the products of action chains that pass through the person who acts in such a manner that the person's action-inclining states are at least among the action's causes.

Suppose Sam decides to commit murder. If determinism is true, this decision is in fact inevitable given things that occurred in the distant, preSam past. The compatibilist will note that the causal chain that yields Sam's decision "runs through Sam," so to speak, whereas other causal chains do not do so. The earlier portion of the causal chain that yields the pre-Sam events whose occurrence, if determinism is true, render his choice in fact inevitable has in fact run through Sam. The compatibilist will add that there are logically possible worlds in which Sam's decision does not obtain; the events that render Sam's decision in fact inevitable would not obtain if one of those worlds was the actual world. This is the difference between Sam's decision being logically inevitable and its being in fact inevitable. Presumably, if determinism is true, it is not logically possible that the events that render his decision in fact inevitable occur without his decision also occurring – not unless one could have the same events but different causal laws. The core of the compatibilist's position will lie in the development of a notion of is under the control of where something is under one's control provided one could have done otherwise or one was compatibilistically free relative to whether something occurred. Thus compatibilist freedom invites our attention.

Compatibilist freedom

One suggestion regarding what this sort of freedom amounts to is this: let D be a description of what has occurred up to time T, L a statement of the laws of nature, and L* a statement of the laws of logic. Let their conjunct be the whole past package. Jane wonders whether or not to lie to John. It turns out that Jane lies to John is compatible with the whole past package, and Jane does not lie to John is not compatible with the whole past package.¹⁴ The idea is to leave room for Jane's being free even though what Jane will do must be compatible with the whole past package and only one of the logically possible alternatives is compatible with that package; on this view, whatever sort of freedom responsibility requires is constrained by this condition. Given the conditions described, Jane will lie to John, her lying to John is in fact inevitable, and Jane is morally responsible for lying to John is compatible with Jane's not lying to John is incompatible with the whole past package. Jane's lying, on this account, follows from what has happened prior to her lying, given the laws of logic and the laws of nature.¹⁵

The range of what can be said to give this alleged freedom content should be explored. If Jane's lying is an action on Jane's part, it must be related to Jane in certain ways – this, we might say, is the positive story regarding Jane's freely lying. The positive story is the story of the conditions regarding Jane's actually lying, whether it concerns what she did or what was not done to her. Further, if she is free in performing that action, her not performing it must have been available to her in certain ways – this, we might say, is the negative story regarding Jane's freely lying. The negative story is the story of the conditions regarding the availability to Jane of refraining from lying. The combination of the positive story and negative story, where both are told with compatibilist constraints, will be the whole compatibilist story regarding her freely lying. There is no universal agreement among compatibilists as to how this story goes, and we will give a very full account that captures a good many of the elements that compatibilists include in that story. What we say about the version of the story here can also be said about other compatibilist accounts.

Constraints

For an account of free action to be compatibilist, it must be the case that it can be a true account even if determinism is true. Hence Jane's action is in fact inevitable (where in fact inevitable is understood as we have defined it) and Jane's action is free and she is morally responsible for so acting are logically compatible. Our formulation of the compatibilist account will endeavor to give as broad a definition as this constraint allows – to include as many elements as it allows.¹⁶

The positive story

Jane's lying to John at time T obviously entails Jane lied to John at T. We have already noted that, on a compatibilist account, it entails An action chain that includes Jane's lying to John at T passes through Jane.

A classic analysis of this sort of freedom goes like this: Jane is free in lying to John at time T if and only if (i) Jane lies to John at T, (ii) Jane wanted to lie to John at T, and (iii) Jane's lying is caused by her wanting to. Let us say that if Jane and her lying are related as (i) through (iii) indicate, Jane's lying is congenial. This serves to emphasize that the relevant action chain contains states of Jane that are at least a partial cause of Jane's lying to John, where those states on the whole incline toward rather than against lying.

Here, then, is part of one compatibilist positive story regarding Jane's freely lying to John at time T:

Jane's lying to John at time T is a free action entails Jane lied to John at T, An action chain that includes Jane's lying to John at T passes through Jane, and Jane's lying to John at T is (in the sense defined) congenial to Jane.

This is compatible with Jane's not liking to do it, but liking any other alternative still less.

If Jim has hypnotized Jane to lie, puts a gun to her head to make her lie, or the like, John coerces Jane to lie. If Jane is related to her lying as a kleptomaniac to stealing, Jane is a compulsive liar. Suppose neither of these is the case; then Jane's lying is neither coerced nor compelled. Thus far we have at least a fairly complete positive story – one that includes at least a great deal of what is available to such an account:

Jane's lying to John at T is a free action entails Jane lied to John at T, an action chain that includes Jane's lying to John at T passes through Jane, Jane's lying to John at T is (in the sense defined) congenial to Jane, and At T, Jane is neither coerced nor compelled to lie to John.

The negative story

If this is (one compatibilist version of) the positive story, there is also a compatibilist account of the availability to Jane of not lying to John at time T. If her not lying is just plain not available to her, then her lying isn't a free action.

Jane's not lying is not logically impossible; it is, in that sense, logically available. It is not against the laws of nature; it is, in that sense, naturally available. It is within her capacity in the sense that she knows what a lie is and what she will say to John if she lies and she knows how to say those words, she is not dumb or paralyzed, she has whatever range of cognitive, psychological, and physical capacities is required by not lying; Jane's not lying is, in that sense, competently available. Perhaps it is true that if she had chosen not to lie, she could have refrained from lying; then, in that sense, Jane's not lying is counterfactually available. Even if all this is so, either her choosing to lie or her not choosing to lie is incompatible with the whole past package.¹⁷ Since she lies, her lying is in fact inevitable – it is in fact inevitable that she does not choose not to lie. So even if it is true that if she had not chosen to lie she would not have lied, it is also true that it was in fact inevitable that she did not choose not to lie.

On one version, then, of the compatibilist account,

Jane's lying to John at T is a free action entails Jane's not lying to John at T is logically, naturally, competently, and counter-factually available to Jane at T.

Perhaps there is more.

Perhaps this should be added. Suppose that Jane ordinarily has a set of only true beliefs about what one can expect from ordinary computers, but that one morning her colleagues discover her trying to fry eggs on her keyboard. Jane is, in this respect, irrational in the sense that, given beliefs anyone familiar with computers has, she should know that the result of her keyboard-and-egg behavior will not be breakfast.¹⁸ A compatibilist may wish to add that actions that are irrational on Jane's part are not free actions. If so, we then get:

Jane's lying to John at T is a free action entails Jane's not lying to John at T is logically, naturally, competently, and counter-factually available to Jane at T, and Jane's not lying to John at T would not be irrational.

It should be noted that being irrational here involves such things as having wildly implausible beliefs or reasoning in a chaotic fashion or the like; it is not a sense of irrational in which, for example, acting wrongly is inherently irrational.

Finally, perhaps lack of irrationality in the rough sense broadly characterized should also be added to Jane's act of lying. If we do this, and put the resultant positive and negative stories together, we get this result:

Jane's lying to John at T is a free action entails Jane lied to John at T. An action chain that includes Jane's lying to John at T passes through Jane, Jane's lying to John at T is (in the sense defined) congenial to Jane. At T, Jane is neither coerced

nor compelled to lie to John, and Jane's lying to John at T is not irrational in the sense of resulting from her having wildly implausible beliefs or reasoning chaotically, and Jane's not lying to John at T is logically, naturally, competently, and counterfactually available to Jane at T, and Jane's not lying to John at T would not be irrational.

Perhaps there remains something that we must add in order to express fairly this sort of analysis of the freedom responsibility requires. But somewhere not too far along the road we have been traveling, presumably one gets to that point without having gotten to the point where both Jane's not lying and Jane's lying are compatible with the whole past package. We have come close at least to that point. For a compatibilist, to reach that point is to have gone too far.

The sort of freedom, if it is such, that we have been describing is a fairly complete rendering of compatibilist freedom. One could contest various elements included and perhaps contend for some additions. But it is a fair account of various elements that compatibilists have included in their accounts of compatibilist freedom, and that is all that we need. Is it true that compatibilist freedom is the sort of freedom a moral agent has if she is responsible for her actions?

The Control Principle says:

(CP) One has no control over anything that is entailed by what one has no control over.

The corresponding compatibilist claim is:

(CC) One has control over what one has compatibilist freedom concerning.

The compatibilist will claim that in (CP) "having control of" is given the sense of "has categorical or libertarian freedom regarding" and is thus a claim the compatibilist will reject in favor of (CC). Further, the compatibilist claims, being categorically or libertarianly free is not a necessary condition of being morally responsible. The libertarian response is that one can be neither free nor morally responsible regarding any action that is in fact inevitable. The compatibilist account of freedom may be fine as far as it goes, but it leaves out a crucial element – genuine alternatives that cannot coexist with in fact inevitable actions. The central principle in dispute here has been called the Principle of Alternative Possibilities.

The Principle of Alternative Possibilities

The libertarian typically embraces the Principle of Alternative Possibilities which says that one is responsible for performing an action A on a given occasion only if on that occasion one has categorical freedom regarding performing A as well as categorical freedom regarding refraining from performing A. This principle has met with great resistance of late on grounds worth investigating.

Alleged counterexamples to the Principle of Alternative Possibilities

Recent philosophy has seen a variety of alleged counterexamples to the claim that anyone lacking categorical freedom cannot properly be held morally responsible for anything. The basic idea of the objector is to present cases in which an agent who lacks categorical freedom is nonetheless morally responsible for what she does. Once one sees the relevant recipe, one can construct one alleged example after another; a couple of simple cases will convey the core idea. Suppose that in each case there is a morally right thing to do, and that “responsible” means “morally responsible.”

Case 1: John sits in his room. He has a big chemistry exam tomorrow and can either study for it or go out to the Sherlock Holmes Movie Festival. He loves Holmes films and hates chemistry. Yet he decides to stay at his desk and study. Unknown to him, his parents in any case locked his door from the outside, so he could not have left anyway. Yet John is responsible for his choice to stay at his desk.

Case 2: Mary sits reflecting as to whether to send a bitter letter to her aunt, who has angered her greatly. But she also knows her aunt meant well and that it would be wrong to send the letter. Unknown to Mary, her sister Ann, a doctor, inserted a microchip into Mary’s brain that allows Ann to monitor Mary’s thoughts and control them if she wishes. Ann loves her aunt deeply and is monitoring Mary’s thoughts; if Mary decides not to send the letter Ann will do nothing, but if Mary decides to send the letter Ann will make her reverse her decision. Mary decides on her own not to mail the letter, so Ann does nothing.

The argument then goes as follows: in Case 1, John is responsible for having chosen to stay and study, even though he could not have left had he tried; in Case 2, Mary does not send the letter, even though she could not have sent it had she tried. Neither John nor Mary, in the cases described, possesses categorical freedom, but both are praiseworthy for their actions. If they are praiseworthy, then they are responsible. So possessing categorical freedom is not a logically necessary condition of being responsible for what one does. Hence compatibilism is true.

Here is another way to put the argument. Since to make a choice is to act (an action need not be overt), reference to actions covers choices as well. Consider one version of the Principle of Alternative Possibilities:

(PA) If person S is morally responsible for having performed action A at time T in context C, then S could have refrained from having performed action A at time T in context C.

According to (PA), if John is responsible for having stayed in his room, he could have left it; if Mary is responsible for not having sent the letter, she could have sent it. The point of the cases is that in them (PA) is false and John and Mary are responsible anyway. The alleged truth of (PA) is what justifies the claim that only possessors of categorical freedom are morally responsible for what they do. Since (PA) is discernibly false, making that claim is not justified. But that claim is essential to incompatibilism. So incompatibilism is false. The core idea of this argument is this: if (PA) is false of a case in which an agent acts, it is also false of that agent in that case that he possesses categorical freedom, and there are cases in which an agent acts and is morally responsible for so acting even though (PA) is false of that agent.

Reply to the objections

Regarding Case 1, there are various moves open to an incompatibilist. Here are two:

Move 1: She can say that strictly what John is responsible for is not staying in the room (he could not have done otherwise) but choosing not to try to leave and deciding to study (he could have chosen to try to leave, or not to study). This is what he is responsible for, and (PA) is true of this.

Move 2: While Move 1 is correct so far as it goes, there is an additional consideration. Suppose that a person is categorically free regarding whether she does something

A at time T and in circumstance C, and she knows that, at T and in C, doing A is sufficient for the occurrence of B. Given this knowledge, she does A in order that B may occur. Then she is responsible for B occurring, even if B would have occurred had she not done A. John's deciding to stay in is sufficient for John's staying, and John has categorical freedom regarding how he decides. He is also properly held responsible for what he knows his deciding to stay in is sufficient for.

Move 2 is neither problematic nor uncommon. Suppose a father knows that if he does not promise to pay for his daughter's tuition, her uncle will, but since she is his daughter and he loves her, he wants the tuition to be his gift to her, not anyone else's. What is in the father's power is whether he pays the tuition, but not whether it is paid. He is responsible for the tuition being paid, and his doing so is rightly taken, unless there is special reason to the contrary, as an action he could either have performed or refrained from performing. This fits the pattern described in Move 2.

Another way of seeing the point of Move 2 is to remember Ruth and her golden retriever. The golden retriever will be fed whether Ruth feeds her or not, just as John will stay in the room whether he tries to leave or not. But Ruth is free to decide to do the feeding herself and John is free not to try to leave and free to keep studying, as he is free to try to leave and not to study.

Move 2 does require a clarification of (PA), which should now read:

(PA*) If person S is morally responsible for having performed action A at time T in context C, then (i) S could have refrained from having performed action A at time T in context C, or (ii) there is some action B that S performed such that S could have refrained from performing B, and S's performing B is, at T and in C, sufficient for S's performing A.

Exactly similar moves are relevant to Case 1. So far at least, the incompatibilist is in no danger.

A compatibilist response

The compatibilist case is easily made subtler by tinkering with Case 2. Consider:

Case 3: Mary sits reflecting as to whether to send a bitter letter to her aunt, who has angered her greatly. But she also knows her aunt meant well and that it would be wrong to send the letter. Unknown to Mary, her sister Ann, a doctor, inserted a microchip into Mary's brain that allows Ann to monitor Mary's thoughts and control them if she wishes. Ann loves her aunt deeply and is monitoring Mary's thoughts; she is able to anticipate what Mary's decisions will be before Mary makes them. If Mary, uninterfered with, will decide not to send the letter Ann will do nothing, but if Mary, uninterfered with, will decide to send the letter, then Ann will prevent her from making that decision and cause her to decide not to send the letter. Mary, uninterfered with, decides not to mail the letter, so Ann does nothing.

Here, Mary cannot decide to send the letter. The only alternatives are these: (1) Mary, uninterfered with, decides not to send the letter, and (2) Mary, interfered with, decides not to send the letter. Mary's choice is not "up to her." (One could, of course, tinker with Case 1 in analogous ways.) Nonetheless, the compatibilist argues, if (1) holds, then Mary is morally responsible for her decision even though both (PA) and (PA*) are false of that decision.

Cases 2 and 3 smack of science fiction. Whether their science fiction will become science or not does not matter to the argument. For one thing, if one can describe logically possible cases in which moral responsibility is present and categorical freedom is absent, then possessing categorical freedom is not a logically necessary condition of being morally responsible, and hence incompatibilism is false. For another, if determinism is true, there is something or other (we may have no idea what) that plays the causal role that Ann's interference would play in Case 3 were Ann to have interfered; there is some state of affairs that does obtain and renders the actual occurrence in fact inevitable. The determinist is likely to suppose that talk about microchips and thought monitoring of Mary's decision simply does duty for the properly scientific account of whatever those states of affairs are until we discover how to describe them, if we ever do, though of course that is no argument for anything.

An incompatibilist response

Again, the incompatibilist is not without resources for a reply. How that reply should be cast is a matter of dispute among incompatibilists. Suppose one thinks of an agent as the cause of her choices. In Case 3, as stated, no matter what, Mary will decide not to send the letter. The question is whether she decides on her own – is herself the cause of her choice – or Ann causes her to decide. Then the incompatibilist will make:

Move 3: What remains open even in Case 3 is whether Mary shall cause her choice. If she does cause it, she is responsible, for she could have refrained from causing it. True, had she refrained from causing it, Ann would have caused it for her; in that case, Mary – not being the cause of her choice – cannot be responsible for it. Since she is the cause of her choice, she is responsible for it; but if she is the cause of her choice, (PA*) is true of her choice – she could have caused it (as she did) or not caused it (in which case Ann would have caused it and Mary would not be responsible for her choice).

For Move 3, Case 3 simply requires another application of (PA*). In spite of appearances, it introduces nothing more than this: it brings us up to the point where one sees the very minimal conditions of responsibility, which turn out to be the minimum conditions of categorical freedom.

There is something deeply suspicious, however, about Move 3 as it stands. It makes essential use of the idea that an agent causes her choices. To choose is an action; presumably so is causing a choice. But if an agent chooses to stand up by causing her choice to stand up, presumably she must also cause her causing herself to choose to stand up, and cause her causing her causing herself to choose to stand up, and so on. To choose will involve doing an endless number of causings, causings that are instantaneous and simultaneous or nearly so. We are plainly not aware of doing anything like that, and doing such a magnitude of things seems beyond our powers. Further, there seems no good theoretical reason to suppose that any such thing occurs. In sum: Move 3 requires that an agent perform an endless series of actions in order to make even the simplest choice, which makes making even the simplest choice impossible. The incompatibilist is in trouble if there is no way to state his viewpoint without the assumption that for a person to choose is for him to cause his choices or, more generally, that for a person to act is for him to cause his action.

Correspondingly, the compatibilist account of actions being the results of action chains that include action-inclining states has this feature: the action-inclining states that (at least partially) cause what the compatibilist thinks of as an action are themselves products of other states that are not action-inclining, and as one traces the chain backwards, so to speak, one comes to states that are not only not action-inclining but are also not states of the actor at all. Whether a person acts, and if so in what matter, is rendered in fact inevitable. The incompatibilist is ill-served by joining the compatibilist in accepting this view of what action is.

Consider, then, a different incompatibilist move:

Move 4: If Ann interferes, it is Ann, not Mary, who is doing the deciding – Ann decides that Mary shall not send the letter, and perhaps also that it shall seem to Mary that Mary has decided this. But if Ann interferes then Mary has not decided this. She has made no decision at all if Ann interferes. Nonetheless, even if Ann will interfere if Mary, uninterfered with, does not choose not to send the letter, if Mary does so choose then (i) she could have refrained from so choosing on her own, and so (ii) the principle (PA*) is true of Mary's choosing that she will not send the letter.

The ideas behind Move 4 bear examination. Move 4 makes no reference to Mary causing her choices; it speaks only of Mary choosing. This apparently small difference is nonetheless important for reasons worth discussing.

As above, let the whole past package be the whole truth about the past, plus correct statements of the laws of logic and the laws of nature. An action, then, regarding which Jane has categorical freedom is an action that it is logically consistent with the whole past package that she perform, and logically consistent with the whole past package that she refrain from performing. Let the almost whole present story be the whole truth about the present, plus correct statements of the laws of logic and the laws of nature, except the truth about whether Jane performs or refrains from performing the action in question; this story must, of course, be logically compatible with the whole past package. But it is also the case that if Jane's performing an action is in her power, then Jane's performing, and Jane's refraining from performing, that action is logically compatible with the almost whole story about the present. A definition of in her power along these lines, then, can be put as follows:

(IHP*) Jane has it in her power to perform action A only if her doing so does not require that she make false some truth about the past or the present, some law of logic, or some law of nature; Jane has it in her power to refrain from performing action A only if her doing so does not require that she make some truth about the past or the present, some law of nature, or some law of logic false.¹⁹

If, regarding performing action A at time T, Jane has categorical freedom of the sort defined by

(CF) Jane is categorically (or libertarianly) free with respect to lying at T entails Jane's lying is within her power at T and Jane's refraining from lying is within her power at T.

and (IHP*) is true, an interesting consequence follows: it is logically impossible that Jane be caused to perform A at T.

Since the incompatibilist claims that Jane is morally responsible for doing A at T entails Jane has categorical freedom regarding A at T, and Jane has categorical freedom regarding A at T entails It is logically impossible that Jane be caused to do A at T, the incompatibilist position holds that Jane is morally responsible for doing A at T entails It is logically impossible that Jane be caused to do A at T. It is, then, logically impossible that anyone or even anything causes Jane to make any choice or, more generally, perform any action that she makes or performs categorically freely. Precisely what is essential to something being an action for the compatibilist – that it be caused in a certain way – is logically incompatible with something being an action for the incompatibilist. If one wants the difference put in terms of free action, what necessarily characterizes a free action on the incompatibilist account is logically incompatible with what characterizes a free action on a compatibilist account.

One thing that follows is that, if incompatibilism is true, Case 3 – the third and more sophisticated of the alleged counterexamples to the Principle of Alternative Possibilities – cannot obtain; its description is logically inconsistent and so its occurrence is logically impossible. Hence it is worthless as a counterexample.

One standard complaint regarding libertarianism, which claims not only that incompatibilism is true, but that we have categorical freedom, is that it does not offer a causal explanation of freely performed actions. But if libertarianism is true, it is logically impossible that there be a causal explanation of freely performed actions. Thus the complaint radically misunderstands its target.

Acting not a matter of causing actions

The idea that for Mary to act is not for Mary to cause her action is important enough to receive some further attention. Suppose that the following is true:

- (A) Performing infinite (or an endless) number of instantaneous and simultaneous (or nearly instantaneous and simultaneous) actions is logically, or at least naturally, unavailable to any human person.
- (B) Necessarily, if for an agent to act, she must cause herself to act, and if causing oneself to act is itself an action, an agent acts only if she performs an infinite (or an endless) number of instantaneous and simultaneous (or nearly so) actions.

If (A) and (B) are true, it follows that:

- (C) Performing an action is logically, or at least naturally, unavailable to human persons.

Since (C) is plainly false, and (A) and (B) entail (C), either (A) or (B) is false. Since (A) seems plainly true, presumably (B) is false. This provides another reason for a libertarian to reject the notion of an action as self-caused: no human person could perform the task of self-causing a freely performed action even if it were not logically impossible that a freely performed action be caused.

The incompatibilist, then, in replying to Case 3 – the microchip case where Ann can anticipate Mary's thoughts – had best avoid the notion that Mary causes her actions. The one offering Case 3 need not deny that if Ann interferes, Mary is not responsible, and Case 3 is more plausible if that is not denied. How then, if at all, do our most recent reflections aid the incompatibilist in dealing with Case 3? Consider a refinement of Move 4:

Move 5: If Ann interferes, it is Ann, not Mary, who is doing the deciding – Ann decides that Mary shall not send the letter, and perhaps also that it shall seem to Mary that Mary has decided this. But if Ann interferes then Mary has not decided this. She has made no decision at all if Ann interferes. Ann will interfere if Mary, uninterfered with, does not choose not to send the letter. There remain these alternatives to Mary: freely to choose not to send the letter; not to choose freely not to send the letter. Mary freely chooses not to send it, and relative to that matter she is free. What she is free regarding, she is responsible for. The principle (PA) is true of Mary's freely choosing that she will not send the letter. Since (in accord with (PA*)) she is libertarianly free regarding freely choosing to send the letter, she is praiseworthy for having so chosen. Since freely choosing not to send the letter is, under the circumstances, sufficient for not* sending the letter, Mary is also (in accord with (PA*)) praiseworthy for not sending it.

Here there is no requirement that Mary causes her choice not to send the letter; she simply chooses so. The most recent version of the Principle of Alternative Possibilities read:

(PA*) If person S is morally responsible for having performed action A at time T in context C, then (i) S could have refrained from having performed action A at time T in context C, or (ii) there is some action B that S performed such that S could have refrained from performing B, and S's performing B, at T and in C, is sufficient for S's performing A.

Perhaps in the light of Move 5 we should recast this as follows:

(PA) If person S is morally responsible for having performed action A at time T in context C, then (i) S could have refrained from having performed action A at time T in context C, or (ii) there is some action B that S performed such that S could have refrained from performing B, and S's performing B, at T and in C, is sufficient for S's performing A; minimally, the alternatives will be freely performing A or something sufficient for A and not freely performing A or something sufficient for A.²⁰

Part of what has unfortunately made some philosophers think more of the alleged counterexamples than they should is their focusing only on the contrast between such things as freely choosing to send the letter versus freely choosing not to send the letter while ignoring such things as freely choosing to send the letter versus not freely choosing to send the letter.

Since (PA) is true of Mary even in Case 3, the compatibilist has not presented a case in which the Principle of Alternative Possibilities is false and yet the agent in the case is morally responsible for what the agent does. The incompatibilist can thank the compatibilist for helping to clarify the content of a proper statement of the principle, but has been given no reason to abandon incompatibilism.

The fuller map of counterexamples

The range and subtlety of purported counterexamples to the Principle of Alternative Possibilities are greater than we have yet considered, and the argument is not complete until we have considered them. We can begin this process by asking: if determinism were true, how might things work? For the sake of the argument, suppose that a human person is made up of a mind or soul and a body. Consider some human person Jon. Jon's states at any given time T will be just all the states that Jon's body is in at T plus all the states that Jon's mind is in at T. These states, let us say, are states internal to Jon at T. The states that things other than Jon is in at T are states external to Jon at T. Again for the sake of the argument,²¹ assume that a cause always immediately precedes its effect. Then (say) Jon's smiling at T can be determined by only states internal to Jon at T-1, or only by states external to Jon at T-1, or by a combination of internal and external states at T-1.

Among the external states, some will be states of conscious agents who affect Jon by way of endeavoring to get Jon to behave as those agents want Jon to behave, believe it good that Jon behave, and the like. Among Jon's internal states will be conscious states of Jon himself that constitute Jon's own intentions, motives, purposes, and the like, regarding how he shall behave.²² If Jon is an agent, then Jon has conscious internal states and if other agents want to affect Jon's behavior there will be external conscious states regarding Jon's behavior. If determinism is true, then, how things work (using the language just explained) is this. Suppose that at time T Jon smiles at Sue to let her know he is glad to see her. Perhaps he is tired and must make a conscious effort to smile at anyone; perhaps he simply unreflectively smiles. But in any case he smiles and his smiling is an action on his part which he intentionally performs.

Jon's smiling, of course, is but a single, simple example of what, if determinism is true, is true of all thoughts and actions whatever. Hence it is appropriate to infer general conclusions from this single case, since the single case is an arbitrarily selected example. If determinism is true, perhaps Jon's smiling at Sue at time T must have a cause of one or another of these sorts. Each scenario is intended to state the entire set of causes – conditions sufficient for the effect to occur.²³

Scenario 1: A set of non-conscious states internal to Jon at T-1.

Scenario 2: A set of conscious states internal to Jon at T-1.

Scenario 3: A set of states internal to Jon at T-1, some of which are conscious and some of which are not.

Scenario 4: A set of non-conscious states external to Jon at T-1.

Scenario 5: A set of conscious states external to Jon at T-1.

Scenario 6: A set of states external to Jon at T-1, some of which are conscious and some of which are not.²⁴

Jon intentionally smiled and his intention to smile is an internal conscious state. Jon's smiling presumably involves various non-conscious physical states that are causally intermediate to Jon's smiling; on a determinist model, they occur in a causal chain at which his intention to smile is at one end and his smiling is at the other end. Hence Scenarios 1 and 2 do not fit. Since a state internal to Jon is involved, we can eliminate Scenarios 4 through 6. Only one scenario remains:

Scenario 3: A set of states internal to Jon at T-1, some of which are conscious and some of which are not.

Suppose Jon made a conscious decision to smile before he smiled and consider, not Jon's smiling, but Jon's deciding (at T-1) to smile-at-T; we have again six scenarios exactly analogous to our first six. There may be no conscious state of Jon which, on a determinist model, is the conscious cause of his decision. Then Scenarios 2 and 3, each of which refer to conscious states internal to Jon, are eliminated. Since Sue's presence elicited and, on a determinist view, forms part of a causal chain whose earlier members render Jon's smiling in fact inevitable, it is not only Jon's internal states that cause his decision. So Scenario 1, which refers only to Jon's non-conscious internal states, is eliminated. If no conscious states external to Jon play a causal role in yielding his decision to smile then only Scenario 4 remains.

A libertarian can maintain that, under exactly the conditions in which Jon decides to smile,²⁵ he also could have refrained from choosing to smile, and either choice would be compatible with the truth about the past, the laws of logic, and the laws of nature. A determinist cannot say this. She must hold that Jon's deciding (at T-1) to smile-at-T is related to some state of affairs A at T-2 such that A's obtaining at T-2 is, given the truth about the past, the laws of logic and the laws of nature, not compatible with Jon's not deciding (at T-1) to smile-at-T. Since a compatibilist must give an account of action compatible with determinism being true, she must agree with the determinist.

If we assume Jon to have come to exist at some time finitely past, then in tracing the causal chain that has Jon's smiling at T and Jon's deciding (at T-1) to smile (at T) as later members, we will come to a scenario that refers to no states of Jon whatever, either internal or external, and indeed to no states internal to any non-divine person – states obtaining before any non-divine person graced the world's stage. Since this is so, we may as well simplify things and take Jon's deciding (at T-1) to smile (at T) itself to be such a state – a state caused by no state internal to Jon (and none internal to any other non-divine person).

Monotheistic determinism

Suppose that determinism is true and that God exists.²⁶ If determinism is true of God's creation, then God made it so. God, then, directly or indirectly determines, for each thing, that it shall exist when and where and as long as it does, and for every property of every thing, that it has that property rather than not, and for how long it has that property. Since events are matters of things having properties, God determines all events. Our supposition that determinism is true and God exists is the supposition that God exists and causes everything whatever that occurs. Since God is omniscient, God will not be caught causing things that God was not aware of causing. So every conscious state of Jon, and of every non-divine person, is the product of a conscious state internal to God – God's intention that it obtain, or the like.²⁷

If every thought Jon has is a thought God knowingly caused Jon to have, every act Jon performs is one that God knowingly caused Jon to perform, and indeed every state of any sort Jon is ever in is a state God knowingly caused Jon to be in, a compatibilist must hold that Jon can nonetheless be free and morally responsible with regard to his actions. Theologians and philosophers are sometimes drawn to this view because otherwise God is the agent of evil actions. Sometimes they think that some version of materialism is true, and that materialism entails determinism.

The libertarian, and the determinist who is also an incompatibilist, of course deny this. They will hold it to be false that Jon acts freely. Jon is perhaps a being through whom God acts, but Jon is not an agent at all. Jon does not act; God acts through Jon.

Consider this scenario regarding Jon's smiling at Susan at time T; suppose its full cause is:

Scenario 7: God's conscious state of deciding that Jon shall smile – a conscious state external to Jon – and whatever non-intentional states external to Jon also occur as parts of the deterministic chain to yield Jon's smiling at Susan.

Consider this plausible contention: if those intentional states are caused by someone who is capable of making Jon do whatever they want, and that someone produces them knowing that Jon will thereby be caused to smile at Susan, then Jon is not morally responsible for smiling at Susan – not even if smiling or not is a matter for moral praise or blame. When Mary was not sending her letter, it was rightly said to matter whether Ann interfered or not – whether Ann activated the microchip and thereby caused Mary to act. If any thought or action of Mary's is brought about by Ann using her microchip then Mary no longer is responsible for what Mary thinks or does as a result of Ann's microchip activity.²⁸ God needs no microchip. But if every thought or action of Jon's is caused by God then Jon no longer is responsible for what Jon thinks and does.

One might wonder if while Ann could not cause Mary's thoughts and actions and leave Mary an agent, perhaps God could cause Jon's thoughts and actions and yet Jon remain an agent. Isn't God's case different? It is, but not in ways encouraging to the suggestion that a Jon all of whose thoughts and actions God causes remains an agent. If an omniscient God exists and is Creator, then Jon's coming to exist, and Jon's continuing to exist, depend on God; the remainder of the world in which Jon exists came to and continues to exist by divine courtesy. Far more so than in the relation between Mary and Ann, the relationship between Jon and God, if God causes all of Jon's thoughts and actions, precludes rather than provides for Jon being responsible for his thoughts and actions.

Nonmonotheistic determinism will offer a different account:

Scenario 8: Only nonintentional states at T-1 external to Jon are required to yield Jon's smiling at Susan at T.

What entirely baffles the libertarian is how, if this scenario is correct, and if the obtaining of Scenario 7 would preclude Jon being morally responsible, the obtaining of Scenario 8 would leave Jon morally responsible. True, in the case of monotheistic determinism, there is Someone Else (someone with a mind) besides Jon who knowingly causes Jon to think and act as Jon does, whereas if nonmonotheistic determinism is true there is merely something else (some non-person distinct from Jon) that causes Jon to think and act as Jon does. But the libertarian holds that the difference between Someone Else and something else is utterly insufficient to make the difference between Jon not being morally responsible for Jon's thoughts and actions and Jon's being morally responsible for Jon's thoughts and actions.

The point, then, is this. For all of the compatibilist maneuvering, if God exists and determinism is true, God and any alleged human agent are related as Tess and Tricia, at the outset of our discussion, were related, only (as we said there) more so.

A parenthetical cross-cultural suggestion

In this chapter, we have considered a dispute between a monotheistic compatibilist determinism and a monotheistic libertarianism over whether, if monotheistic determinism is true, created persons are free, and indeed whether there can even be created persons. In Chapter 12, we considered a dispute between Jainism and Buddhism concerning the nature of persons. From the monotheistic libertarian perspective, on the monotheistic compatibilist determinist account, persons reduce to states of affairs that lack freedom and genuine personhood. From the Jain perspective, on the Buddhist account, persons reduce to bundles of momentary states of affairs that lack memory, responsibility, and genuine personhood. The monotheistic compatibilist determinist, and the Buddhist, at least initially, claim that they can retain the ordinary or commonsense view of freedom, memory, responsibility, and personhood. The monotheist libertarian, and the Jain, denies this. So, concerning monotheism, does Spinoza, and, concerning Buddhism, so does absolutistic Mahayana Buddhism. A suggestion: reflection on these cases is a philosophically informative enterprise.

Divine foreknowledge and human freedom

Here is a standard argument to the conclusion that divine foreknowledge is incompatible with human freedom; it (and the analogous argument below) are concerned only with logically contingent statements. If successful, this argument would show that (i) libertarian monotheism is logically inconsistent, or (ii) that future tense statements are neither true nor false and so cannot be foreknown, or (iii) that for some other reason God does not know the future. Since (ii), as we will see, seems plainly false, we would be left with (i) and (iii).

- 1 If God knows today what Sally will do tomorrow, then Sally is not free regarding what Sally does tomorrow.
- 2 If God is omniscient, then God knows today what Sally will do tomorrow.
- 3 God is omniscient. So:
- 4 God knows today what Sally will do tomorrow (from 2, 3). So:
- 5 Sally is not free regarding what Sally does tomorrow (from 1, 4).

Comments on the argument

First, note that God knows that P entails P is true; but God knows that P does not entail God makes P true. An omnipotent God can create a world in which things are true that God did not cause to be true. An omniscient God can know things to be true that God did not cause to be true.

Second, we should distinguish between direction of entailment and direction of truth determination. Entailment is defined this way: Proposition P entails Proposition Q if and only if "P is true but Q is false" is a contradiction. Truth determination is defined in this way: A's obtaining determines B's truth if and only if The explanation that B is true is that A obtains. (To "obtain" is "to be the case" or "to be a fact.")

Third, suppose that Sally will be tempted to lie tomorrow, but will finally decide to tell the truth. Then it is true that (S) Sally will tell the truth tomorrow. Consider that claim, plus (G) God knows that Sally will tell the truth tomorrow. Note two things: (i) the direction of entailment goes from (G) to (S) – to get from (S) to (G) one would have to add God is omniscient; (ii) the direction of truth determination goes from (S) to (G) – what makes (G) true is that (S) is true, not the other way round.

Fourth, given that the directions of truth determination go as noted, it is perfectly compatible with (S) being true, and with (G) being true, that the explanation of Sally's telling the truth tomorrow is that tomorrow she freely chooses to tell the truth. Sally can be a libertarianly free moral agent whose decision to tell the truth explains the truth of (S). The explanation of (G)'s being true is just that God is omniscient and (S) is true. This is perfectly compatible with (S) being true because of a free choice by Sally. If this is so, then divine foreknowledge is compatible with human freedom. Hence divine foreknowledge is compatible with human freedom. The argument, then, fails to establish the intended incompatibility.

How not to understand "God knows today what Sally will do tomorrow"

- 1 As inferential knowledge. If X knows today that Sally will do B tomorrow, and X must infer Sally will do B tomorrow, then X must know something like this: X must know that A obtains now and that It is a law that if A obtains now then Sally does B tomorrow. Then something obtains now the obtaining of which is sufficient for Sally's doing B tomorrow. An omniscient being will have no need to make such inferences in order to know anything.

- 2 As a probability grid or its product. It is possible to think along these lines: if Sally does B freely tomorrow then her doing B is unpredictable other than probabilistically; if her doing B tomorrow is unpredictable other than probabilistically, then there is some chance that she not do B tomorrow; if X knows now that Sally will do B tomorrow, it follows that Sally will do B tomorrow; so if X knows now that Sally will do B tomorrow, then her doing B tomorrow is not to be understood probabilistically; so if X knows now that Sally will do B tomorrow, her doing B tomorrow is not free. But a monotheist who holds both that God has foreknowledge of human actions and that those actions are free is not thinking along these lines nor would or should she think in terms of a probability grid. That S does A freely does not entail That S does A is in principle unpredictable or S's doing A is only very probable or the like. Nor is an omnipotent being in the position of having to be content with probabilistic knowledge. Perhaps a being who learned what would happen in the future would suffer this limitation, but an omniscient being has no learning to do.²⁹

Truth and the future

Since it does not appeal to the idea that God causes whatever is true to be true, what force the above argument for the incompatibility of divine foreknowledge and human freedom had is also captured by this argument.

- 1 Every true future tense statement is now true.
- 2 If every true future tense statement is now true, then determinism is true. So:
- 3 Determinism is true.

This argument could in principle be given at any time, regarding all future time. If it was always sound and valid, then determinism would be true.

An argument regarding premise 1

The first premise assumes that (1*) Future tense statements can be true. This claim can be defended as follows:

- 1a It is now true that (i) either (ii) the next President of the US will be a former Celtic center or (iii) the next President of the US will not be a former Celtic center.
- 1b (i) is of the form ((ii) or (iii))
- 1c A proposition of the form ((ii) or (iii)) is true only if its components – i.e., (ii) and (iii) – are either true or false. So (from 1a to 1c):
- 1d (ii) and (iii) are either true or false.
- 1e (iii) = not-(ii) (obvious).
- 1f If (ii) and (iii) are either true or false and (iii) = not-(ii), then either (ii) is true or (iii) is true. So (from 1d to 1f):
- 1g Either (ii) is true or (iii) is true.
- 1h If (ii) is true, then some future tense statement is true.
- 1i If (iii) is true, then some future tense statement is true. So (from 1g to 1i):
- 1j Some future tense statement is true.
- 1k If some future tense statement is true, then future tense statements can be true. So (from 1j and 1k):
- 1* Future tense statements can be true.

Further, if some future tense statements are now true, it seems arbitrary to deny that the true ones are now true. But does this entail determinism?

That depends on what makes future tense statements true. Had Aristotle stopped lecturing one day and laconically commented that in the future a human being would stand on the surface of the moon, what he said would have been true. What would have made it true was some human being standing on the surface of the moon at some time later than that at which Aristotle offered his comment. If instead Aristotle had said that some time in the future someone would freely steal a pear, that would be made true by someone freely stealing a pear at some time later than that at which Aristotle's comment was made. There seems no more problem in this case than in the case of the human being standing on the surface of the moon. Or, if there is any problem, it has to do with the relevant notion of freedom, not with Aristotle getting something right before it happened. That a proposition is true at some time T does not entail that what makes it true obtains at T.³⁰ So present truth of future tense propositions does not (contrary to 2) entail determinism.

Conclusion

After considerable searching, no genuine counterexample to the Principle of Alternative Possibilities has surfaced. Suppose that Tricia is related to God as considered above. If God creates a world in which the initial conditions come from God's hand and everything that comes afterward is in fact inevitable, it is hard to see why the fact that a causal chain passes through Tricia, or that in a world with different initial conditions different behavior by Tricia would have been causally inevitable, provides any reason to think that Tricia possesses any sort of freedom that makes her responsible for anything. What Tricia's possessing compatibilist freedom comes down to is simply that a causal chain runs through Tricia's cognitive makeup and that in a world with different initial conditions different behavior by Tricia would have been causally inevitable. The libertarian seems right in thinking that this is not enough to make Tricia a free and responsible agent. If determinism and monotheism are both true, it is dubious that there can be more than one agent. If this is correct, consistent monotheists will be libertarians.

Questions for reflection

- 1 How can one tell whether moral values are fundamental within a particular religious tradition?
- 2 Does it make any difference to morality whether God exists or not? Why, or why not?
- 3 Explain determinism, compatibilism, and libertarianism.
- 4 Suppose that God exists, determinism is true, and compatibilism is true. Does anything different follow regarding morality that would not follow if God didn't exist?
- 5 Suppose that God exists, determinism is true, and compatibilism is false. Does anything different follow regarding morality than would follow if compatibilism were true?
- 6 Sometimes religious believers claim that if there were no God, there would be no morality. Sometimes critics of religion claim that all religion perverts morality. Are either right?

Annotated reading

Frankfurt, H. G. (1988) The Importance of What We Care About, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. A very influential contemporary defense of compatibilism.

Honderich, T. (1993) How Free Are You?, Oxford: Oxford University Press. Another defense of compatibilism.

Molina, L. (1988) On Divine Foreknowledge, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, trans. Alfred Fredoso. The standard presentation of the view that God knows what free persons, created or not, will or would do.

Rowe, William L. (1991) Thomas Reid on Freedom and Morality, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press. An excellent discussion of Reid's libertarian views.

Van Inwagen, Peter (1983) An Essay on Free Will, Oxford: Clarendon Press. A powerful critique of compatibilism.

Watson, G. (ed.) (1982) Free Will, Oxford: Oxford University Press. An excellent collection of essays concerning libertarianism.

Zagzebski, Linda (1991) The Dilemma of Freedom and Foreknowledge, New York: Oxford University Press. A detailed discussion of divine foreknowledge.

CHAPTER 15

Faith and reason

Faith

Knowledge

Scientism

Propositions

The epistemic status of religious belief

Robust foundationalism

Confirmationism and falsificationism

Ways of being falsified

Theistic arguments and explanatory power

Questions for reflection

Annotated reading

Faith and reason

Faith

Religious faith is at its core an acceptance of the diagnosis and cure proposed by some religious tradition accompanied by an attempt to live in the light of that tradition's teachings. In monotheistic traditions, it includes personal trust – trust in God as loving and faithful. In nonmonotheistic contexts, it includes acceptance of the efficacy of particular esoteric experiences achievable by prescribed efforts. There is thus a close connection between a faith – the doctrinal content of a religious tradition as embedded in its rites, institutions, practices, and its oral or written texts – and faith or acceptance, and life in accord with acceptance, of that tradition. Having faith involves having some understanding, very limited in some cases and quite rich in others, of the tradition within which the faith is had. Whether having faith involves some sort of conflict with reason – believing against evidence, accepting on authority an alternative no more favored by evidence than many others, or the like – depends on what tradition one accepts, and what the evidence is. Our focus here will be on the completion of the overall argument, which requires facing the general question: how, besides appeal to religious experiences and the sorts of arguments already considered, can one rationally assess religious traditions. In terms of the issue we put off until later in discussing the argument from design, how can competing large-scale explanations be evaluated?

Knowledge

There is, of course, considerable skepticism that, if the explanations are religious, rational assessment is possible. Religious belief is often presented as far removed from “ordinary” and from “scientific” belief. The current fashion is to think and speak of religious belief as a private matter – supposedly religion and morality are deeply individual, subjective affairs ruled by “the heart” (which here means something like “idiosyncratic, arbitrary taste and sentiment”).¹ This view is neither justified nor workable. Regarding morality: either murderers, child molesters, slaveholders, and drug dealers act wrongly, or they do not. If they do, then laws against them are justified. If they don’t – if all there is to acting “rightly” or “wrongly” is “acting in a way privately but arbitrarily liked by some person or group” or “acting in a way privately but arbitrarily disliked by some person or group” – then laws against murder, etc. are also without any justification. Private sentiments are not rightly publicly enforced. Regarding religion: either God exists or God does not exist; either nirvana can be achieved or not. If God exists, God is either trinitarian or not. These things are so, or not so, independent of what anyone thinks. An omniscient deity, no less than the planet Pluto or the Green Bay Packers football team, either exists independent of our thoughts, or not.

Scientism

A standard reply is that while perhaps this is so, no one can tell whether God exists or not, so there are just opinions and feelings about such matters. This reply typically is based on the idea that we can only know what science can tell us. The reply is particularly ill-founded, since We can only know what science can tell us is not something science can tell us, so if the reply were sound it would itself be just a matter of the opinion and feelings of those who offered it. It may be worthwhile to put this point fully and formally, if briefly, as follows.

Scientism holds:

- 1 All explanation is scientific explanation.

Note that 1 is not itself justifiable by appeal to science alone; it is a view in theory of knowledge or epistemology – a piece of philosophy, not a piece of science, which neither presupposes it nor otherwise requires it. At this point it is useful to make a simplifying assumption to the effect that:

- 2 All scientific explanation is explanation in physics.

Almost certainly false, this is the view of traditional believers in the unity of science; if one wishes, one can replace “physics” in this argument by something like “physics, chemistry, biochemistry, biology, geology, and geography” or even by “natural science.”

- 3 Explanations in physics use no concepts and no laws save those of logic and physics.
- 4 All explanation is explanation in physics. (from 1 and 2)
- 5 All explanations use no concepts and no laws save those of logic and physics. (from 3 and 4)

Here, a reminder about explanations is relevant. Explanations have two parts. One part is an explicandum or to-be-explained – an explainee, if you like – that tells you what the explanation is an explanation of. This must be described in terms that are accessible to the other part of the explanation. The other part is an explicans or explainer that tells you what is the reason for the explainee; this by itself is often called “the explanation.” A genuine explainee is one that can be related to a genuine explainer. If, as premise 5 says, all explanations are explanations in physics, then all explainers can be described in all ways relevant to explanation only by the concepts of physics. Then all explainees must be related by the laws of physics to the explainers. Then for all purposes relevant to explanation the explainees must be described only by the concepts of physics.

- 6 For all purposes relevant to explanation, one needs nothing other than physical concepts and laws to explain or describe anything. (from 5)
- 7 Any (non-ultimate) property that a thing has is a property for which there is an explanation.

An ultimate property, defined in terms of the present argument, will be any property, defined in purely physical terms, that physical theory takes things to have but cannot explain their having.

- 8 One needs nothing to describe or explain any (non-ultimate) property that anything has except the laws and concepts of physics. (from 6, 7)
- 9 If one needs nothing other than physical concepts and laws to explain or describe any (non-ultimate) property, and all explanations are explanations in physics, then all of our knowledge is physical knowledge.
- 10 All of our knowledge is physical knowledge (knowledge in physics, fully expressible in terms of the concepts of physics). (from 8, 9)

Here, we reach the conclusion scientism requires. The problem is that the argument naturally continues as follows:

- 11 Reference only to physical descriptions and explanation of things will not justify us in thinking that something is an explanation, or in thinking that all of our knowledge is physical knowledge (knowledge in physics, fully expressible in terms of the concepts of physics).

- 12 If all of our knowledge is physical knowledge (knowledge in physics, fully expressible in terms of the concepts of physics) then all that we have to justify us in thinking that something is an explanation or that all of our knowledge is physical knowledge (knowledge in physics, fully expressible in terms of the concepts of physics) is reference only to physical descriptions and explanation of things.
- 13 If all of our knowledge is physical knowledge (knowledge in physics, fully expressible in terms of the concepts of physics) then all of our knowledge will not justify us in thinking that something is an explanation, or in thinking that all of our knowledge is physical knowledge (knowledge in physics, fully expressible in terms of the concepts of physics). (from 11, 12)

So scientism is self-defeating.

Belief and knowledge: religious and otherwise

In fact, religious belief and knowledge is in many ways not unlike belief and knowledge of other sorts. Understanding this will prepare the way for pointing out some of the ways in which various sorts of belief and knowledge, religious and non-religious, interact and intermingle.

Propositions

We know many things – that two plus two is four, that there are golden retrievers, that oak trees are not made of gold, that we exist, that broccoli does not taste like chocolate, and so on through an enormously large number of pieces of knowledge. We typically say what we know by asserting something. We say that two plus two is four, that there are golden retrievers, that oak trees are not made of gold, that we exist, that broccoli does not taste like chocolate, and so on. What we thus assert is true. If we are multilingual, we can assert the same truths in more than one language. If we are not multilingual, we can do the same thing by using various sentences in the language we know to say the same thing: 2 and 2 is 4; 2 and 2 sum to 4; adding 2 and 2, we get 4; and so on. It is not the sentences that are true; what is true is what we use the sentences to assert. It will be useful to have a term for what we use sentences to assert; the term proposition is standard. A proposition is the bearer of truth value – anything that is true, and anything that is false, is a proposition.

Necessity, belief-entailment, and contingency

Some of the things we know are true no matter what. If you add two things and two things, you get four things; if you draw a circle then you draw a figure; if you are six feet tall then you are not also not six feet tall. These are necessary truths; they are true under any possible conditions and cannot be false. Some of the things we know are not true, no matter what, though they are true, given the way things are. There might not have been any golden retrievers, and we might not have existed. There being no golden retrievers and our not having existed are ways the world could have been; there are possible conditions under which the world would have been that way. So that there are golden retrievers and that we exist are non-necessary truths; since speaking of non-necessary truths is an unlovely way to talk, philosophers have instead spoken of such truths as contingent.²

Among the contingent truths that we know, some have a particularly secure status. I believe that I exist. This belief has the following feature: it is logically impossible that I believe it and that it is false. In that respect, my belief that I exist differs from my belief that there are golden retrievers, that oak trees are not made of gold, that broccoli does not taste like chocolate, and even from my belief that you exist. My beliefs that I am conscious, that I can have conscious states, that I do have conscious states, that I can have beliefs, and that I do have beliefs all have the feature that it is logically impossible that I believe them and that those beliefs are false. We will describe such beliefs as belief-entailed. For each of us, there is a rather small set of beliefs that have this feature; we can call the contingent truths that we know by virtue of having these beliefs belief-entailed contingent truths.³ false. Our comprehending acceptance of necessary truths and of belief-entailed contingent truths precludes having them if they are entailed contingent truths, let us say, constitutes unbreakable knowledge, and our comprehending belief that such propositions are true unbreakable beliefs. Other contingent truths – the vast majority – are corrigible truths; they could be believed true even if they were false. Among the things we know, then, are necessary truths, belief-entailed contingent truths, and contingent truths that are not belief-entailed.

Religious believers would like their religious beliefs to be unbreakable. This is not logically possible. Only logically necessary truths and belief-entailed propositions are candidates for being unbreakably believed. This is why they cannot be self-authenticated. Religious beliefs are part of that large set of beliefs that are not unbreakable because they are not beliefs that something logically necessary or belief-entailed is true. What is neither a necessary truth nor a belief-entailed proposition is necessarily neither a necessary truth nor a belief-entailed proposition. So religious beliefs are necessarily not unbreakable beliefs. There is not only no point in trying to make them so; the hypothesis that they are is simply self-contradictory. Nor is there anything to lament here; it is not sensible to lament that the logically impossible does not obtain. There is no loss here – nothing that could not possibly be so amounts to a loss of anything. That religious beliefs are not unbreakable beliefs should be kept in mind as we consider faith and reason. It will help us do this realistically.⁴

In order to have a neutral expression, let us say that if Kim believes that her golden retriever wants a treat – remembering that Kim's golden retriever wants a treat is neither a necessary truth nor something whose truth follows from Kim's believing it – let us say that her belief is a piece of delicate knowledge and the belief that constitutes it a delicate belief. A delicate belief can be true, well supported by evidence, and reliable. A delicate belief can be false, against the evidence, and unreliable. Much of what we know is constituted by our true delicate beliefs.⁵ Delicate knowledge is not a defective version of unbreakable knowledge; it is not any kind or version thereof.⁶

Probability

Delicate beliefs are typically, though perhaps misleadingly, said to be only probable. What is meant by this is sometimes clear and sometimes unclear. The proposition The odds of getting a six with a fair throw of a fair die in a fair environment is one in six is a necessary truth. But the beliefs that the die, or the throw, or the environment in question are fair are delicate beliefs, and if they have any probability, the proposition ascribing that probability to them is not a necessary truth.

Suppose that it is a probabilistic law that Given the occurrence of an event of kind A, the chances of the occurrence of an event of kind B is 99.9. Assuming we know that this is a law and that an event of type A has occurred, we know that the odds are 999 to 1 that an event of type B will occur. Here, we can quantify our probabilities. We can also quantify our probabilities in the absence of any known laws. Suppose that we have 99 marbles in a bag, 33 each of blue, red, and green. Assume that conditions are such that our odds of drawing a red marble from the bag is one in three (being blindfolded, we cannot look into the bag and pick what color marble we want, etc.). A reliable friend tells us that the marble we take from the bag is not green. So we know it is either red or blue. There are now 98 marbles in the bag, and 33 of them are green. Either there are 33 red and 32 blue, or 32 blue and 33 red; we do not know which. So now we can infer that, relative to our knowledge, the odds of our picking a red marble are either 32 in 98 or 33 in 98, but we don't know which. The same goes, relative to our knowledge, for the odds of our picking a blue marble. We may also infer that either the odds of our picking a red marble or a green one are better than our picking a blue one or a green one or the odds of our picking a blue one or a green one are better than our picking a green one or a red one; we don't know which. In such cases, where natural laws are not directly relevant, we can quantify both the objective odds and what the odds are, relative to our knowledge.

Very often, we can do neither. What the odds are, if any, that my computer is on, my window is closed, or my dog asleep are not quantifiable in any real sense. We can say that, since the computer seems to be on, my window appears to be closed, and my dog looks like he is asleep, the odds are better than 5 that these things are so. But that is either metaphorical or else a matter of forcing the notion of quantifiable probability onto a case where it does not fit.

In cases in which quantitative probability is inapplicable, many philosophers nonetheless use the calculus that would apply were the probabilities in question quantifiable. The assumption is that there are non-quantifiable probabilities and that non-quantifiable probabilities behave as do quantifiable probabilities. We can call this the assumption of universal probabilism. The issues that concern us in the pages ahead do not concern quantifiable probabilities. We can remain neutral about whether the assumption of universal probabilism is true. What requires saying can be said using such notions as evidence and entailment.

The epistemic status of religious belief

A religious tradition that involved only unbreakable beliefs would be an odd enterprise. Imagine a tradition that accepted mathematical truths of the sort 1 and 1 are 2, 1 and 2 are 3, 2 and 2 are 4, 2 and 3 are 5 and so on and propositions of the sort I exist, I am conscious and the like. Their resources for stating, within their chosen framework, either a universal human problem or a solution thereto would be highly limited. No delicate propositions being permitted to stain the security of their tradition, there could be no descriptions of institutions or practices, and so no way of gathering or behaving included in this austere imaginary religion. No such proposition as Kim needs salvation could be formulated, since that proposition is neither a necessary truth nor a belief-entailed truth.⁷ The very understandable fact is that no religious tradition has ever limited itself to such a slender doctrinal base. But this fact is no defect in religious traditions. Nor has any political, scientific, or academic tradition ever limited itself in this way. Nor is there any reason why they should, and there is excellent reason why they do not.

Robust foundationalism

Robust foundationalism has a high standard for proper belief. According to it, one properly believes a proposition P only if it is logically impossible that one believe that P and P is false – only where co-presence of belief and falsehood cannot arise. This limits objects of proper belief to necessary truths and belief-entailed propositions. Even if those monotheists who joined Anselm in thinking that God exists is a logically necessary truth are right, few if any religious beliefs can be properly believed on robust foundationalist standards. All or most religious beliefs, in that respect, join There are trees, Texas covers more territory than Rhode Island, There are pigeons in New York City, and London, England is not located in Delhi, India, as well as almost everything else anyone believes. This is not a source of proper concern, since It is proper to believe only what robust foundationalism says it is proper to believe is itself not something even a robust foundationalist could properly believe.⁸

Religious claims

When we deal with such questions as whether seven is greater than five, what twenty-nine times forty-eight is, whether the argument form If P then Q , Q or R , not- Q , hence R or not- P is valid, and whether Necessarily, P entails Necessarily (Necessarily, P) we deal with things to be thought through without essential appeal to sensory experience. Reports of sensory experiences will not tell us what the answers to these questions are; only abstract reasoning will do that. When we deal with questions of whether there is a tree in the yard, how apples taste, whether crows will be kept from crops by playing rock music in the fields, and what black bears eat, we deal with things to be answered by reference to reports of sensory experiences; abstract reasoning will not tell us the answers. Sensory evidence and abstract reasoning is each precious relative to their knowledge-potential, though they are different; it is foolish not to value both highly if one values knowledge.

If one looks at the sorts of claim that are central to religious traditions – the ones presupposed or entailed by the diagnoses and cures that such traditions offer – it is obvious that they are not merely sensory reports and they are not merely reports of the result of abstract reasoning. Like theoretical claims in science, they are something different from either sensory reports or reports of lines of abstract reasoning. How, then, might they be rationally assessed? Taking our cue from the noted similarity to theoretical claims in science, let us briefly consider two perspectives in the philosophy of science.

Confirmationism and falsificationism

A light touch on philosophy of science

Some simple definitions will facilitate stating these two perspectives.

Definition 1: X is a truth condition of proposition P = P is true if and only if X obtains.

Thus Sam is sad now has as its truth condition Sam's being sad now. Proving that a proposition is true is also proving that its truth condition obtains; giving reason for thinking a proposition true is giving reason to think its truth condition obtains.

Definition 2: S is an observation statement if and only if S ascribes an observable quality to an observable object.

The car is red, The table is brown, The cat is black, This coffee is bitter are observation statements.

Definition 3: G is a generalization over observation statements if and only if G is of the form All X's are Q and G is formed by inferring it from observation statements of the form X1 is Q, X2 is Q, X3 is Q etc. and G is not simply a conjunct of observation statements.

Definition 4: T is a theoretical statement if and only if T is neither an observation statement nor a generalization over observation statements and T's truth would explain the truth of some observation statement or generalization over observation statements.

Definition 5: E is a relevant explanation of P if and only if (i) E is true entails P is true, and (ii) E is true is either a scientific or a personal explanation of P is true.

Definition 5a: E is a scientific explanation of P only if E's truth condition obtaining is related by law to P's truth condition obtaining.

- Definition 5b: E is a personal explanation of P only if E has the form Agent A so acted as to bring about P's truth condition.
- Definition 6: T is an available theory if and only if T is a proffered unfalsified relevant explanation of explication-eligible facts.
- Definition 6a: F is an explanation-eligible fact if and only if Fact F obtains is logically contingent, known to be true, and is possibly explicable.
- Definition 6b. Theory T is unfalsified if and only if we have examined explanation-eligible facts F such that T is true is a relevant explanation of F obtains and we have no reason to think that after rigorous examination T is false.
- Definition 6c. T is proffered if and only if someone offers T.

Attention is limited here to scientific and personal explanations because they are the sorts of theory relevant here, whether or not there are other sorts of explanation. While sometimes a scientific community keeps a theory it knows or has good reason to think false – continues to teach it to students and construct experiments suggested by the theory – this is like driving an oil-burning, gas-guzzling car because one hasn't access to a better one. Only explanations someone actually thinks of can be assessed, so we are inherently limited to actually proffered theories, though since one can proffer theories by thinking them up this limitation need not be suffocating. Confirmationism and falsificationism are theories about theory assessment. They provide different answers to the question: how can we rationally assess available, relevant, unfalsified theories? Each is a complex theory, but a brief account will be useful here.

A light touch on confirmationism

Confirmationism at its core holds that: If P entails Q and Q is true, then P is supported by Q. This apparently simple core doctrine is unfortunately more complex than it seems. First, the argument form (If P then Q; Q; Hence: P) is invalid; it commits the fallacy of affirming the consequent. If it were proper reasoning, one could prove oneself a billionaire by arguing If I have a billion pounds, then I have at least a pound; I have at least a pound; hence I have a billion pounds but would be distressed by the result of If I weigh a billion pounds then I weigh at least a pound; I weigh at least a pound; so I weigh a billion pounds. Confirmationism, then, has to be stated carefully enough to make it clear that committing this fallacy is not part of confirmationism; it encourages no such absurdities.

Second, “entails” here must bear a specific meaning; it must mean “non-vacuously entails” where this term is defined as follows:

Definition 7: P non-vacuously entails Q if and only if (i) it is logically impossible that P is true and Q is false, (ii) P is not a necessarily false proposition, and (iii) Q is not a necessarily true proposition.

Otherwise, each logically contingent proposition C will entail all of the necessary truths and so will be confirmed by them – by an infinite number of truths that would be true even were C false. Thus if C is a logically contingent proposition, both C and not-C would be “confirmed” by an infinite number of truths. Reading “entails” as “non-vacuously entails” avoids these absurdities.

Third, consider this unhappy argument: Either (a) the moon is a prime number or the Packers have a winning record; (b) the moon is not a prime number; so (c) the Packers have a winning record. Since (a) and (b) entail (c), (c) confirms ((a) and (b)). But this is obviously false. Similarly, (c) entails (c); but (c) does not confirm (c). So we need something like this: P’s entailing Q and Q’s being true does not confirm P if either Q is identical to P or Q is a component of P.⁹ Then that (a) and (b) entails (c) does not by itself explain (c)’s being true. All this is implicit in confirmationism.

Perhaps, then, we can more carefully put confirmationism along these lines: If P entails Q, and P is a scientific or a personal explanation of Q, then if Q is true, its truth confirms P. Q confirms P means something like Q’s truth supports P’s truth or That Q is true is evidence that P is true or the like; it does not mean Q’s truth shows or guarantees that P is true. Suppose that Q is entailed by all of P1, P2, P3, . . . P100. Then if Q is true, and if confirmationism is true (assuming that P1 . . . P100 satisfy the conditions stated above) Q’s truth confirms each of P1 through P100.

Typically, data underdetermines theory in the sense that any fact or set of facts can be explained by various theories; nonetheless, it is often not easy to think of explanations that both satisfy the conditions stated above and are not known or reasonably believed to be false. Confirmationism claims that a theory that explains a little is confirmed a little and a theory that explains a lot is confirmed a lot, even if neither “little” nor “lot” can be quantified.

Falsificationism

Falsificationism rejects this notion. Why should the fact that If there is a leprechaun who has absolute power over the location of computers who wants my computer to be on my desk, that will explain my computer being on my desk and There is a leprechaun who has absolute power over the location of computers who wants my computer to be on my desk would explain My computer is on my desk be taken to confirm the conjunction (If there is a leprechaun who has absolute power over the location of computers who wants my computer to be on my desk, that will explain my computer being on my desk and There is a leprechaun who has absolute power over the location of computers who wants my computer to be on my desk)? The idea that it does so, but by so little that one hardly notices it, is more desperation than defense.¹⁰

Falsificationism accepts these claims:

- 1 Theory T is a good theory regarding data F if and only if T has not been falsified and if T has explanatory power regarding F.
- 1a T has explanatory power regarding F if and only if If T is true then its truth explains that F obtains.
- 1b T has not been falsified if and only if T has been rigorously tested and we still have no reason to think that T is false.
- 2 Being confirmed by F is nothing more than not having been falsified and having explanatory power regarding F.
- 3 While one might have to continue to work within the framework of a falsified theory (one needs some context for research and a false theory may provide a useful context), other things being equal it is better to work within a non-falsified theory.
- 4 A non-falsified theory is uninteresting regarding F if its truth would not explain F's obtaining; there is no point in pursuing theories that are uninteresting regarding the data that we possess.
- 5 It is reasonable to believe any available relevant theory that is unfalsified, has explanatory power, and has no competitors.
- 6 In cases of competing available relevant unfalsified theories T1 and T2 with explanatory power, it is reasonable to believe (T1 or T2) and to endeavor to falsify one or the other.
- 6a Theories T1 and T2 are competing if and only if (i) the things that each explains are the same as what the other explains, or (ii) some proposition P1 essential to T1 and some proposition P2 essential to T2 are such that it is logically impossible that both be true.¹¹

Ways of being falsified

A standard case of falsification is mistaken prediction; it notes that theory T entails that result R will obtain if a certain experiment is performed, the experiment is run, and R does not occur – so T is falsified. What is crucial here is not that the false proposition that T entails is future tense; what matters is that T entails a proposition and we have discovered that the proposition is false. It is having discernible entailments whose truth value is discoverable that matters here, and the idea that this is always or essentially a matter of prediction is mistaken.

The false proposition entailed by a falsified theory need not be a mistaken report of observational consequences. There are various grounds on which a theory may be rationally rejected. For example, there are various types of what we might call intellectual suicide. Here are three. The claim No one can know anything said in English is self-defeating in that (i) no one could know it were it true. The claim Nothing said in English can be true is self-refuting in that (ii) its being true is incompatible with what it says is true. Nothing can be said in English is self-destructing, (iii) being an instance of what it says cannot exist. A more interesting example of self-destruction is the claim All language is metaphorical; as a nonmetaphorical use of language, it is itself the very sort of thing it says there cannot be. There are deep problems with such claims but the problems do not arise from their entailing false observation statements. Such claims, and views to which they are essential, commit intellectual suicide; there is no chance that they constitute knowledge. A theory defective in any of these ways is rationally rejected.¹²

A theory that essentially contains a contradiction is false. (Theory T contains proposition P essentially if and only if with P, T explains the data it is intended to explain, and without P, it does not.) Any set of propositions that is essentially incoherent cannot comprise a theory. (Propositions P and Q are coherent if and only if they are (i) logically consistent and (ii) mutually relevant to explaining what the theory in which they both appear is intended to explain.) If it is essential to theory T that propositions of kind K1 be translatable without remainder into propositions of kind K2, and they cannot be, then T is false. If it is essential to theory T that propositions of kind K1 not be translatable without remainder into propositions of kind K2, and they can be, then T is false. If theory T is such that if its truth conditions obtain, it is false, then T is false whether or not its truth conditions obtain. (A theory's truth conditions are just what must exist for the theory to be true.) If theory T is such that T is true entails T cannot be reasonably believed, then T cannot be reasonably believed. If theory T entails P, and we know that P is false, then we know that T is false. (Some theories entail that there is no moral knowledge, or that sensory experience is never reliable; if we know that it is wrong to torture infants for pleasure or know by sensory experience that there is a door to our room, these theories are false.) If T's only rationale is that accepting T solves problem Q, and T does not solve Q, then there is no rationale for accepting T. If T does not explain data within T's reference range, then at best T is incomplete. (A theory's reference range is the set of data that it was created to explain.) So disconfirmation has many varieties.

To summarize, confirmationism tells us that we should accept only theories that have been confirmed; falsificationists tell us that we should accept only theories that have explanatory power and have not been falsified.

Theistic arguments and explanatory power

One way of thinking of the standard arguments for monotheism is this: their premises refer to such things as there being things that might not have existed and are possibly explicable, the accessibility of the world to human cognitive powers, there being a distinction between right and wrong, there being self-conscious morally responsible agents, and the like. Such arguments are possible only insofar as theism has explanatory power regarding such facts as these. Theism need not be the only explanation of these facts in order to have explanatory power regarding them. The monotheistic arguments have any force only if the facts mentioned are such that, if monotheism is true, then it provides (a personal) explanation of their obtaining. Part of a different style of argument for monotheism has the following first premise:

M1 Monotheism has explanatory power regarding things hard to explain otherwise.

Its second premise is:

M2 Monotheism has not been falsified.

In the light of the argument earlier concerning monotheistic belief and religious experience, and stating the premise neutrally between confirmationism and falsificationism, the third premise is:

M3 There are experiences it is reasonable to think veridical that are veridical only if monotheism is true (there is experiential evidence for monotheism).

A falsificationist can accept the principle of experiential evidence used in an earlier chapter, and the reports of persons to the effect that they have had the experiences they report. She can thus accept M3 without inconsistency. Put otherwise, a falsificationist can accept the argument of Chapter 10 without accepting anything incompatible with her falsificationism. So, of course, can a confirmationist. The argument concludes:

M4 If monotheism has explanatory power regarding things hard to explain otherwise, monotheism has not been falsified, and there are experiences it is reasonable to think veridical that are veridical only if monotheism is true, then there is evidence that monotheism is true.

The conclusion is:

M5 There is evidence that monotheism is true.

If M4 is true, it is a necessary truth, and M1–M4 obviously entail M5.

Weak rationality and strong rationality

How is one to understand M5? Here is one more set of definitions:

Definition 1: Rita is weakly reasonable in accepting proposition T if and only if Rita accepts T, Rita is not unreasonable in accepting T, and Rita would not be unreasonable in rejecting T (where T is a theoretical proposition).

Being weakly reasonable in accepting T is equivalent to something in the neighborhood of not believing against evidence and not believing something that has no explanatory power. That proposition P is believed with weak reasonability is compatible with not-P being believed with weak reasonability, and with rational suspension of belief regarding P.

Definition 2: Rita is strongly reasonable in accepting T if and only if Rita accepts T, Rita is not unreasonable in accepting T, and Rita would be unreasonable in rejecting T.

Being strongly reasonable in accepting T is equivalent to something in the neighborhood of one's believing against evidence if one rejects T and if one suspends judgment regarding T. Being strongly reasonable in believing that T is compatible with one's having evidence against T so long as one's evidence for T outweighs any reasons that one might have for rejecting T.

Rationality and explanatory power

Plainly, one is strongly reasonable in accepting a proposition for which one knows one has a knowledge-extending proof. One is strongly reasonable in accepting a proposition P that has explanatory power regarding data that one is aware of, provided one has no reason to think P false, and one knows of no other theory that has explanatory power relative to that data, especially if the data in question is hard to explain.¹³

What is finally of interest regarding rational assessment is how things fall when everything relevant, or everything relevant that we can think of, is taken into account. Anything strongly rationally accepted in that context is rationally impressive. Whether monotheism, or any other religious perspective, is strongly rational depends on how it fares relative to its non-religious competitors as well as its religious contraries. The argument here, if successful, gives reason to think that monotheism is strongly reasonable to believe in comparison with the other religious perspectives considered. Whether it is strongly reasonable to accept when compared, say, to materialism is a matter into which we have not inquired.

Belief and blame

The definitions and comments here are not part of what some philosophers call the ethics of belief – the attempt to specify conditions under which one is blameworthy or praiseworthy relative to holding some belief, and when one's having a belief is morally neutral.¹⁴ They are part of an effort to say what goes into rational assessment of religious beliefs, not religious believers.

Our discussion has been concerned with how rational assessment of a faith can be conducted. We have argued that, contrary to a widely held view, rational assessment of various faiths or religious traditions is possible, and we have given suggestions and illustrations as to how it can be done.

Questions for reflection

- 1 Is the critique of scientism offered here successful?
- 2 How are the critiques of scientism and robust foundationalism similar?
How do they differ?
- 3 Discuss the idea that there can be evidence against religious beliefs.
- 4 Discuss the idea that there can be evidence for religious beliefs.
- 5 Assess the merits and limits of confirmationism and falsificationism.
- 6 What relevance, if any, has the notion of explanatory power to religious belief?

Annotated reading

Mavrodes, George (ed.) (1970) The Rationality of Belief in God, Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall. A good collection of essays on the reasonableness of monotheistic belief.

Mitchell, Basil (1981) The Justification of Religious Belief, Oxford: Oxford University Press. A clear presentation of the cumulative-case argument for monotheism.

Penelhum, Terence (1983) God and Scepticism, Dordrecht: D. Reidel. Clear discussion of monotheism and skepticism about monotheism.

Swinburne, Richard (1981) Faith and Reason, Oxford: Oxford University Press. A detailed account of faith and reason by a philosopher who thinks that one ought to have reasons for one's religious beliefs.

Yandell, Keith E. (1986) Christianity and Philosophy, Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans. A systematic exploration of issues relevant to monotheistic belief.

Glossary

This glossary defines philosophical terms used in this book, giving them the sense they bear here. Unfortunately, not all of these terms have the same sense whenever they appear in a philosophy book. Terms marked with an asterisk () are also defined in the glossary.*

Advaita Vedanta A Hindu religious tradition whose core doctrine says that the only thing that exists is Brahman without qualities; its most famous expositor is Shankara.

argument A set of claims (premises) from which another claim (the conclusion) is supposed to follow in such a way that evidence has been provided for the conclusion's truth.

bundle theory The view of persons on which a person at a time is a collection of momentary states and over time is a series of such collections.

Christianity A monotheistic* religion whose central doctrine is that God* became incarnate in Jesus Christ who died for our sins and whose resurrection from the dead is the basis for our hope of life everlasting.

compatibilism The view that we can be morally responsible for our actions even if determinism* is true.

consistency strategy The strategy of arguing that because three propositions, none of which is a necessary falsehood, are consistent with one another, any two of them are consistent with one another.

cosmological argument An argument* to the effect that there being things that might never have existed and/or depend for existence on something else is best explained by reference to a being that cannot depend on anything else and has the power to create them.

determinism The view that only one future is compatible with the past.

diagnosis An account of someone's illness.

doctrine A claim about God, human persons, the human condition, the cosmos, and the like, made by a religious tradition.

dualism The view that there are minds and bodies, each of which belongs to its own kind, neither of which is reducible to the other.

enlightenment The condition of having achieved release from the cycle of rebirth.

entails A proposition P entails a proposition Q if and only if it is logically impossible that P is true and Q is false; There are three hens entails There are at least two hens.

essence An essence is a set of properties that makes what has those properties the member of a kind; Water is H O ascribes an essence to water, and Persons are self-conscious agents ascribes an essence to persons.

- ethical theory A full-dress ethical theory offers answers to the questions When is moral reasoning appropriate (what makes an issue moral)?, What makes an action right or wrong?, What makes a person good or evil?, Is act morality basic to the morality of persons or is the morality of persons basic to act morality?, What sort of life is worth living? in a way that is intended to be consistent, coherent, and true.
- ethics That part of philosophy concerned with the construction, assessment, and application of ethical theories*.
- evil The knowing destruction or diminishing of natural* or moral value* without sufficient moral justification.
- faith The acceptance of religious doctrine and the endeavor to live in accord with it; an essential element in faith is trust if the doctrine claims the existence of a cosmic person.
- foreknowledge God's knowledge of truths about the future.
- formal logical necessity A proposition is formally logically necessary if and only if it has the form P and not-P or entails a proposition that has this form; Bill Russell is not both six feet nine inches tall, and not six feet nine inches tall is formally logically necessary.
- God An omnipotent and omniscient being, Creator of the world and providential in guiding the course of history, and a morally perfect agent.
- idealism The view that everything that exists is a mental thing, a state of a mental thing, a quality of a mental thing, or a relation between mental things.
- informal logical necessity A proposition* is informally logically necessary if it is logically necessary* (there are no possible conditions under which it would be false) but not formally logically necessary* (it is not of the form P and not-P and it entails no proposition of this form); If William draws a rectangle then William draws a figure is informally logically necessary.
- interactionism The view that dualism is true, that material states cause mental states, and mental states cause material states.
- invalid argument An argument* that is not valid*.
- Islam A religious tradition that is monotheistic*, holding that God gave a revelation to Mohammed in Arabic, the Koran, through which it interprets the Christian and Jewish Bibles.
- Jainism An Indian religious tradition, one of whose core doctrines is that persons enjoy necessary existence and inherent knowledge.
- Judaism A religious tradition that is monotheistic*, holding that God gave the law to Moses, called Abraham and made him the father of a chosen people; its sacred scriptures, the Hebrew Bible, includes the books of the Christian Old Testament.
- karma The doctrine of karma claims that one receives good consequences for good actions and bad consequences for bad actions, some of the consequences typically coming in a different lifetime than the deed from which they arise.
- libertarianism The view that we have freedom of choice, and compatibilism* and determinism* are false.
- logical necessity A property of propositions*; a proposition has this property if and only if there are no possible conditions under which it would be false; it is identical to necessarily true*.
- logically contingent A proposition is logically contingent if and only if there are conditions under which it would be true and conditions under which it would be false.
- logically impossible A proposition is logically impossible if and only if it is not logically possible*; the denial of a logically impossible proposition is logically necessary*.

logically possible A proposition is logically possible if and only if there are conditions under which it would be true; logically necessary* and logically contingent* propositions* are logically possible.

materialism The view that everything that exists is a material thing, a state of a material thing, a quality of a material thing, or a relation between material things.

metaphysical necessity A proposition is metaphysically necessary if and only if it is logically necessary and it either is an existential statement* or states what the essence* of something is.

modal proposition A proposition* to the effect that another proposition is logically possible*, logically necessary*, or logically contingent*; if such a proposition is true, it is necessarily true* and if false it is necessarily false*.

monotheism The view that there exists one God*, in contrast to atheism which holds that there is no God and polytheism which holds that there are many gods but not one God.

moral value The dignity or worth inherent in being a self-conscious libertarianly free agent capable of making choices that are right or wrong.

morality See ethics*.

natural value The worth inherent in the flourishing of a thing that has an essential nature capable of normal development.

necessarily true A property of propositions*; a proposition has this property if and only if there are no possible conditions under which it would be false; it is identical to logical necessity*.

numerical identity Self-identity; the sort of identity a person or thing at one time has with herself or itself another time and anything has with itself at a time; strictly, all identity is numerical identity.

ontological argument An argument* to the effect that it is logically impossible that God not exist.

ontological independence Something X has ontological independence of Y if and only if X does not depend for its existence on Y; something has full ontological independence if there is nothing distinct from itself on which it depends for its existence.

person A self-conscious agent.

phenomenological description A description of how things appear to a subject of experience, whether or not things are as they appear.

problem of evil The problem that exists provided the occurrence of evil is evidence against the existence of God*.

proposition A proposition is anything that is either true or false; we use declarative sentences to express propositions, but the same proposition can be expressed by using different strings of words in one or more languages, so propositions are not sentences.

qualitative identity Perfect similarity.

reason The capacity to see necessary truths*, make inferences, remember, observe and describe, explain and understand, learn, and so on through a rich variety of capacities.

reincarnation The doctrine of reincarnation claims that persons beginninglessly, and endlessly unless they become enlightened*, are born and die and are born and die and are born and die.

religious experience An experience that a religious tradition takes to be significant for salvation or enlightenment.

- religious pluralism The view that no religious tradition is true and that every religious tradition produces morally good people except those that do not.
- religious tradition A tradition that offers a diagnosis* of what it alleges is our deep and enduring problem and proposes a cure for that problem.
- salvation The condition of being rightly related to God*, with sins forgiven.
- self-authentication A proposition is self-authenticated to a person by an experience if and only if it is logically impossible* that the person accept the proposition on the basis of the experience and be mistaken in so doing.
- semantic logical necessity = informal logical necessity*.
- substance theory The theory of persons on which they are self-conscious beings that endure uninterruptedly over time.
- syntactic logical necessity = formal logical necessity*.
- teleological argument An argument* to the effect that the intelligible order in nature that makes everyday action and natural science possible is best explained by reference to a Mind in whose image our minds are made.
- Theravada Buddhism An Indian religious tradition, one of whose core doctrines is that a person at a time is simply a bundle of states and over time is simply a series of such bundles.
- Upanishad A sacred Hindu text; the exact number is disputed, but there are at least over a hundred.
- valid argument An argument* such that if one asserts its premises and denies its conclusion, one accepts a self-contradiction.

Selected great figures in the history of philosophy of religion

Dates in medieval Indian philosophy are often, like those asterisked here, approximate.

St Anselm [1033–1109 CE] One might begin with his Monologium and Proslogium which center on the notion of God as that being than whom no greater can be conceived and the ontological argument.

St Thomas Aquinas [1225–1274 CE] One might begin with Of Being and Essence and then dip into Summa Theologica [Part I, Question 2, Articles 2, 3 contain his “Five Ways” or arguments for God’s existence] and Summa Contra Gentiles (I, 12, 13 contains a fuller discussion of the argument for God’s existence).

Aristotle [384–322 BCE] One might begin by considering his discussion of God or the Unmoved Mover in Metaphysics 12.

Augustine [354–430 CE] One might begin with his discussion of God and time in Confessions, Book 11; The City of God is his longest and greatest philosophical–theological work.

Averroes [1126–1198 CE] One might begin with The Incoherence of the Incoherence which criticizes both Avicenna and Al Ghazali.

Avicenna [980–1037 CE] One might begin with the discussion of God as a necessary being in The Metaphysica of Avicenna.

Samuel Clarke [1675–1729 CE] One might begin with A Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God; Part II contains a version of the cosmological argument.

René Descartes [1596–1650 CE] One might begin with his Meditations on First Philosophy.

Al Ghazali [1058–1111 CE] One might begin with The Incoherence of the Philosophers which attempts to refute twenty philosophical propositions.

David Hume [1711–1776 CE] One might begin with his Natural History of Religion and go on to the Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion.

Immanuel Kant [1724–1804] One might begin with his Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysic, and go on to the Critique of Practical Reason, and Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone; the Critique of Pure Reason is his most difficult work and most influential relative to the philosophy of religion.

Gottfried Wilhelm von Leibniz [1646–1716 CE] One might begin with the Principles of Nature and Grace and The Leibniz–Clarke Correspondence.

Madhva [1238–1317 CE]* One might begin with his Brahma-Sutra-Bhasya.

Moses Maimonides [1135/8–1204 CE] One might begin with his Guide for the Perplexed, I, 71–II, 31, where he considers arguments for the existence of God, and the topic of creation; in the Introduction, he lists twenty-five propositions derived from and summarizing Aristotle's philosophy.

Philo [approximately 20 BCE–50 CE] One might begin with On the Creation and On the Unchangeableness of God.

Plato [429–347 BCE] One might begin by reading his discussion of the immortality of the soul in the Phaedo [esp. 78B–80C] and his discussion of an early version of the argument from design for God's existence in the Timaeus.

Plotinus [204–270 CE] One might begin with The Enneads, III, 7 on eternity and time, and IV, 7 on the immortality of the soul; VI deals with the kinds of being.

Ramanuja [1017–1137 CE]* One might begin with his Brahma-Sutra-Bhasya.

Shankara [700–800 CE]* One might begin with his Brahma-Sutra-Bhasya; a sutra is a principle (literally, a thread) and the principles of Vedanta are believed to have been collected by Badarayana into a work on which later followers of Vedanta comment.

Baruch Spinoza [1633–1677 CE] One might begin with his Ethics, Book I.

Notes

Preface

- 1 The nonsense line was most famously defended by A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth, and Logic (New York: Dover, 1952). Cf. the critique in Alvin Plantinga, "Verificationism and Other Theologia," in God and Other Minds (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1967). The famous or infamous "University Discussion" between Antony Flew, R. M. Hare, and Basil Mitchell ("Theology and Falsification," in Antony Flew and Alistair McIntyre (eds), New Essays in Philosophical Theology (New York: Macmillan, 1957)) and "An Empiricist's View of the Nature of Religious Belief" in John Hick (ed.), The Existence of God (New York: Macmillan, 1964) express positions near to Ayer's account. Frederick Ferré responded to this sort of perspective in Language, Logic, and God (New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1967), as did the present author in Basic Issues in the Philosophy of Religion (Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1971). A wider range of issues is dealt with very nicely in William Alston, Divine Nature and Human Language: Essays in Philosophical Theology (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1989).
- 2 Sometimes this line rests on appeal to some version of relativism; at other times, it rests on the alleged impossibility of cogent argumentation across religious traditions. Cf. the present author's "Some Varieties of Relativism," International Journal for Philosophy of Religion, Vol. 19, pp. 61–85, 1986, and Paul J. Griffiths, An Apology for Apologetics (Maryknoll, New York: Orbis Books, 1991).

1 Introduction

- 1 Philosophy of religion is metaphysics, epistemology, and ethics applied to religion. Philosophy, of course also includes logic, history of philosophy (which includes history of philosophy of religion), aesthetics, political philosophy, and so on. My concern here is with philosophy as it relates most closely to philosophy of religion.
- 2 As well as what there isn't, what isn't known, and what is not good.
- 3 Nirvana aside.
- 4 What appears to be an enduring thing is a series of momentary things.
- 5 This claim, of course, is controversial. So are the varieties of claims that evil is evidence against the existence of God.
- 6 Advaita Vedanta also appeals to Hindu Scripture.

2 What is philosophy? What is religion? What is philosophy of religion?

- 1 Everett Hall, Philosophical Systems (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1958) offers what I take to be the best book ever written on the nature of philosophy, though the final chapter disappoints.

- 2 Alvin Plantinga's (Professor of Philosophy at the University of Notre Dame) remark to the effect that good philosophizing is just thinking really hard and well is right so far as it goes, and it is what one thinks about that makes one's thought philosophical.
- 3 Cf. the comments by Everett Hall, Philosophical Systems: A Categorical Analysis (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), 3–6, on what medieval philosophers said regarding being, truth, and goodness. Thoughts that something is so are either true or false, and being true or false is essential to their nature. So thing, thought, value, like being, truth, and goodness, come under theory of reality, theory of knowledge, and ethics, which are the core disciplines for the philosophy of religion.
- 4 In terms of specifics, our focus will be on Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism – on Semitic and (South Asian) Indian religion.
- 5 By gods and goddesses as well, if there are any; by every person other than God.
- 6 Need it be said that these characterizations, accurate so far as they go, do not begin to plumb the complexities of these disciplines?
- 7 The view that all language, or all religious language, is non-literal is unfortunately widespread. It will be discussed below. As my comments here reveal, I take the view to be false.
- 8 The degree to which this is, or is not, peculiar to philosophical claims does not matter for our purposes; it is enough that it is true of philosophical claims.

3 What sorts of religion are there?

- 1 Proposition Q assumes proposition P amounts to If P is false then Q is false which in turn amounts to If Q is true then P is true which amounts to Q entails P.
- 2 I am assuming that an accurate account of a religious tradition, whose accuracy is measured by reference to that religion's authoritative texts, is one that an informed adherent would accept. The sheer fact that some adherent did not accept the account offered here would, by itself and without reference to those texts, be without force.
- 3 It seems fairest to describe religious traditions in terms that most faithfully reflect their traditional doctrinal formulations. This procedure is followed here. Thus, from the standpoint of orthodox Christianity in any of its forms, so-called "Atheistic Christianity" is exactly the contradiction-in-terms that it seems to be, and someone who offers as a full explanation of the resurrection of Christ that the spirit of Jesus survived death does not believe that the resurrection of Christ occurred. From the standpoint of almost any Buddhist tradition, the Buddhist monks who held that one can give a coherent account of reincarnation and karma only if there is a mental substance that endures through lifetimes are highly nonrepresentative Buddhists. Nonetheless, the sorts of considerations applied to religious traditions here apply to non-standard versions as well.
- 4 Judaism's sacred text, the Hebrew Bible, is largely the Old Testament which, with the New Testament, comprises the Christian Bible (what Protestants call the Apocrypha, Roman Catholics view as part of the Old Testament). Islam accepts both Testaments, interpreting them in the light of its distinctive sacred text, the Koran.
- 5 Perhaps with the exception of abstract objects.
- 6 Strictly, what a so-called "cyclical view of time" seems to involve is the idea that a sequence of events occurs that fits a very complex description D, only to be followed by another sequence of events that also fits D, and so on for ever, with no sequence of events occurring that does not fall into this pattern. The book that told the universe's story would be a sequence of identical chapters. This is a view, not about time, but about the repetition of one pattern of events. A "one-directional" view of time, in the sense intended here, entails that the same story, told over and over, would not match up with what occurs.

- 7 I Corinthians 15: 3, 4.
- 8 For Vedanta, the Vedas and Upanishads with the authoritative commentaries on these texts by Badarayana and others; for Jainism, the Jaina Sutras; for Theravada Buddhism, the Pali Canon.
- 9 I must have found this version in A. L. Basham, The Wonder That Was India (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1954) but I cannot relocate it.
- 10 Maitri Upanishad I, 3–4.
- 11 H. C. Warren, Buddhist Scriptures (Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1959), p. 186.
- 12 This is not true for the other varieties of Vedanta, or for all versions of Mahayana Buddhism.
- 13 Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan and C. A. Moore (eds), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1957), p. 513. Hereafter cited as “RM.”
- 14 RM, p. 269.
- 15 Herman Jacobi, trans., Jaina Sutras (New York: Dover Publications, 1962; originally published in 1896); I, p. 264.
- 16 Jaina Sutras, II, p. 64.
- 17 RM, p. 260.
- 18 RM, p. 284.
- 19 H. C. Warren, Buddhism in Translations (New York: Atheneum Press, 1969), p. 146.
- 20 RM, op. cit., p. 125.
- 21 Also, of course, nirvana – whose nature will be discussed in a later chapter.
- 22 This will be clearer after we have discussed the conceptual contexts within which the diagnoses and cures are held.

4 What sorts of religious experience are there?

- 1 Exactly how many sensory modalities there are seems to be a matter of dispute. Wondering how many current theory offered us, I went to our local bookstore to check out the introductory textbooks in use in psychology, which in the local context seemed at the time not to differ greatly from introductory physiology. Three texts were in use, and while each ridiculed traditional philosophers like Aristotle and Locke for thinking that there were five sensory modalities, they themselves differed as to how many there are; eleven, thirteen, and seventeen were proposed. Nothing argued here requires that there be five, eleven, thirteen, or seventeen sensory modalities. There are at least the five noted.
- 2 The relevant account here is of course enormously complex; by the time beliefs based on commonsense perceptual experience are purified by filtering them through contemporary theory, it is plausible that (say) experience of God, if it is reliable at all, is the basis for beliefs that need less filtering than their perceptual cousins.
- 3 Or perhaps sub-kind, since all are sensory experiences.
- 4 Anything having this property, or the next, has it essentially.
- 5 There are two ways of having the property not being alive – having been alive and now being dead, and not being capable of life. Corpses have the former, rocks the latter. I do not intend that this way of putting things entails the existence of negative properties – it is fine with me if not being alive just amounts to lacking being alive.
- 6 There are complications here that we need not get into in detail. Suppose that something like traditional monotheism is true, a monotheism that includes (a) If anything exists that might not have existed, then God exists. Any actual experience of sort B is something that might not have existed. So if (a) is true, God exists. But God exists entails (something along the lines of) There is a self-conscious being of impressive holiness whose presence elicits worship. Happily, this sort of complexity can be avoided by using the notion of relevance conditions that relate experiences and claims, as we will do before we consider the question of the evidential force of religious experience. So it is not cheating to ignore it here.

- 7 Note that the criterion as stated is stronger than it would be were it only required that B differed from A in that it would not follow from B's veridicality that A was not veridical.
- 5 The importance of doctrine and the distinctions of religious traditions
- 1 John 14:6.
 - 2 John 3:36.
 - 3 Acts 4:12.
 - 4 George Thibaut, trans., The Vedanta Sutras of Badarayanna with the Commentary of Sankara (New York: Dover Publications, 1962; originally published 1896), Vol. II, p. 399.
 - 5 Geshe Sopa and Elving Jones, A Light to the Svatantrika-Madhyanika, p. 62; privately circulated.
 - 6 The knowledge in question is not construed as merely knowledge by description, but there is no pretense of a knowledge by acquaintance that does not include some knowledge by description.
 - 7 Munkara Upanishad III, i, 3.
 - 8 I, 271.
 - 9 Digha Nikaya II, 251.
 - 10 I John 5:20.
 - 11 B'hai and Advaita Vedanta both hold this view; so do various secularized versions of Protestantism and Catholicism.
 - 12 Another factor promoting the same "all religions are the same" line is a popular sort of mind-set that has persuaded itself that religions make no claims at all. Sometimes this rests on some principle of meaning (that is likely not to meet its own standard). Sometimes it is based on a view of what it is to know that something is true (that is likely not to be knowable on its own standards). Sometimes it rests on some sort of relativism (that is likely in turn to make relativistic the view that no religion makes truth-claims). Sometimes it rests on a new account of truth (that will serve its intended purpose only if it is true in a sense of truth of which it provides no account). Each of these perspectives has its own varieties, and it would take some space to describe, and more space to discuss, these views. The present author has argued against such views in Christianity and Philosophy (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1984) and Hume's "Inexplicable Mystery": His Views on Religion (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990), as well as in "Empiricism and Theism," Sophia, Vol. 7, No. 3, October 1968, pp. 3–11; "A Reply to Nielsen," Sophia, Vol. 7, No. 3, October 1968, pp. 18, 19; "Some Varieties of Relativism," International Journal for Philosophy of Religion, Vol. 19, pp. 61–85, 1986.
 - 13 I have written about these views elsewhere. See "On the Alleged Unity of all Religions," Christian Scholars' Review, Vol. VI, Nos 2 and 3, 1976, pp. 140–55, and "Some Varieties of Religious Pluralism," in James Kellenberger (ed.), Inter-religious Models and Criteria (New York: St Martin's Press, 1993), pp. 187–211.
 - 14 Cf. the present author's Basic Issues in the Philosophy of Religion (Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1970), chapter 1.

6 Religious pluralism

- 1 (London: Macmillan, and New Haven: Yale University Press).
- 2 (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1995).
- 3 Much of the rest of it will come up during our critique.
- 4 Professor Hick in A Christian Theology of Religions, op. cit. claims the religions ask different questions. I want to suggest that these questions, whilst specifically different, are generically the same. They all presuppose a profound present lack, and the possibility of a radically better future; and they are all answers to the question, how to get from one to the other. In traditional Christian language they are all ways of asking, What must I do to be saved?

(p. 41)

- 5 Ibid. Professor Hick says, “each of the great world religions is a response to the ultimately real, and that each is a context of human salvation,” and “On the one hand religious pluralism leaves the different doctrinal systems intact within their own religious traditions, but on the other hand it proposes the meta-theory that these traditions, as complex totalities, are different human responses to the Real.”
- 6 Ibid.

Not more than one of these rival belief-systems could be finally and universally true, and yet the traditions within which they function seem, when judged by their fruits, to be more or less equally valid responses to the Real. Now the distinction between the Real in itself and the Real as variously humanly thought and experienced enables us to understand how this can be: namely, the differing belief-systems are beliefs about different manifestations of the Real. They’re not mutually conflicting beliefs, because they’re beliefs about different phenomenal realities. It’s in this sense that they are reduced or “downgraded” in their scope.

- 7 Ibid. To the question “that’s a pretty radical reinterpretation, isn’t it?” Professor Hick replies, “Yes; but we really do have to make a choice between a traditional absolutism and a genuinely pluralistic interpretation of the global religious situation.”
- 8 Ibid. As a basis for these claims, Professor Hick asserts that:

I want to say that what is literally or analogically true of, say, the heavenly Parent of Christian belief – for example, that God is loving, like an ideal parent – is mythologically true of the Real in itself . . . I mean by a myth a story that is not literally true but that has the power to evoke in its hearers a practical response to the myth’s referent – a true myth being of course one that evokes an appropriate response. The truthfulness of a myth is thus a practical truthfulness, consisting in its capacity to orient us rightly in our lives. In so far as the heavenly Parent is an authentic manifestation of the Real, to think of the Real as an ideal parent is to think in a way that can orient us rightly to the Real, evoking in us a trust which can pervade our lives and free us to love our neighbour. And of course I want to give a parallel account of the language about the Ultimate used by each of the other world religions.

- 9 If one asks what reason there is for thinking religious pluralism to be true, Professor Hick’s answer is: “the hypothesis is offered as the best explanation’, i.e. the most - comprehensive and economical explanation, from a religious point of view, of the facts of the history of religions. A proffered 'best explanation' is not a proof, because it is always open to someone else to come forward and offer what they believe is a better explanation. And so the right response of someone who does not like my proposed explanation is not to complain that it is not proved but to work out a viable alternative." I reject this notion of what "the right" response is. If I propose that the reason why our friend is putting cherry pies into the dishwasher is that she thinks the pies are prime numbers, you do not have to offer another hypothesis in order to show that my explanation would not work. Prime numbers aren't things you can move around.

- 10 The terms "nice" and "morally nice" serve merely as place-holders for substantive accounts of moral virtue. RP thinks there is deep moral agreement between religious traditions. If one looks at more than overt behavior, this is dubious. It also apparently thinks that morality does not significantly change with changes in metaphysics; this too is highly dubious.
 - 11 Hick, A Christian Theology of Religions, op. cit., p.118.
 - 12 This is argued in some detail in the present author's The Epistemology of Religious Experience (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995).
 - 13 Hick, A Christian Theology of Religions, op. cit., p. 62.
 - 14 Ibid., p. 71.
 - 15 Ibid., p. 69.
 - 16 Ibid., pp. 62, 63.
 - 17 Ibid., p. 67.
 - 18 A monotheistic doctrine on which human persons are created in God's image can allow that a concept can be human and reliable. So can a view in which the idea of revelation is taken seriously. But RP filters these out.
 - 19 One could simply say that logic generates terms – say, predicates – not properties. Then the predicates are such that a predicate F corresponds to a property if a sentence of the form "X is F" is true. On a widely accepted account, terms replacing "X" in "There is an X" and "For all X" refer to things and terms replacing "F" in "There is an x such that Fx" and "For all x, Fx" are true or false of things. It does not matter to my argument whether or not we speak of terms or properties; it can be cast in either manner.
 - 20 Professor Hick's way of speaking, and mine here as well, is in various ways shorthand for a more careful account. For example: (i) a formal system of logic is not a system of propositions, but of propositional functions – "There is an x such that Fx" and "For all x, Fx" are neither true nor false; they are but logical skeletons of existential and universal propositions, respectively; (ii) hence such things as "For all X, X = X" and "For all x, Fx or not-Fx" are neither true nor false; (iii) the interpretation of a formal system applies it to propositions, and logic applies to things via applying to propositions true or false of those things.
 - 21 Hick, A Christian Theology of Religions, op. cit., p. 60.
 - 22 Ibid., p. 63.
 - 23 Ibid.
 - 24 Ibid., p. 67.
 - 25 I've made the point in print twice without its importance being noted. The admission it refers to is itself enough to refute RP.
 - 26 Strictly, I suppose, we'd have one genus – happy properties – with two species: happy properties that are generable from logic, and happy properties that are not. I leave it to the reader to work out the rephrasing of my argument that this point would require.
 - 27 Hick, A Christian Theology of Religions, op. cit., p. 62.
 - 28 When Professor Hick says that religious experience is a response to the transcendent Real, he means it is not merely a projection by us. The Real contributes something and we contribute something.

7 Monotheistic conceptions of ultimate reality

- 1 It is logically consistent with monotheism that there exist abstract objects that possess logically necessary existence. Abstract objects have no causal powers, are not self-conscious or even conscious, and exercise no creation or providence. They are of little if any religious interest. It is a necessary truth that If X has logically necessary existence then there is nothing Y such that Y is distinct from X and X depends on Y for X's existence. So if There are abstract objects that have logically necessary existence is true, it is also true that There exists something whose existence does not depend on God. God's status as Creator, and any coherent notion of divine sovereignty, does not require that something that cannot depend for its existence on anything else depend for its existence on God or deny that the existence of such things is logically possible. But the only candidates for being something of this sort would seem to be things that exist with logical necessity.
- 2 Trinitarian monotheists speak in this fashion, though typically holding God to be three persons in one substance; other monotheists speak of God as personal while adding that it is proper to speak in this way because God is more like a person than God is like anything else. The latter claim rests in part on views concerning the alleged limits of descriptions of God. For a monotheistic tradition to make even the comparatively weak religious claims central to Greek monotheism, God must be self-conscious. For a monotheistic tradition to make the more robust religious claims characteristic of Judaism, Christianity, Islam, or Hindu monotheism, God must be a self-conscious agent – one who knowingly and purposively acts. A self-conscious agent is a person.
- 3 Roughly Aristotelian in content.
- 4 If the point isn't clear, consider a parallel case. If I ask for the accurate explanation of the existence of this very duck that walks the shore in front of me, the answer is that it had parents. But if I want to know the explanation of there being any ducks at all, I cannot properly be told about there being duck parents; there being duck parents is (part of) what I want explained.
- 5 Arguably, this claim is typical of but not essential to Semitic monotheism.
- 6 Exodus, chapter 2 passage in which God, in standard translations, makes self-reference by using the terms "I am" seems not to require a stronger philosophical reading than that expressed by something like God exists, and it is logically impossible that God depend on anything else for existence.
- 7 Of course $N(Np) - \text{Necessarily, Necessarily, } p -$ is a second-order modal proposition, and one can go on up the ladder. We will go to third-order in a moment.
- 8 Here is a little more: 1 P entails proposition Q if and only if it is logically impossible that P be true and Q be false (i.e., if P, but not Q is a contradiction); 2 No necessary truth entails a necessary falsehood; 3 No logically contingent proposition entails a necessary falsehood; 4 No necessary truth entails any logically contingent proposition; 5 Every necessary falsehood entails any proposition whatever (this assumes the rules If P then (P or Q) and If (P or Q) and not-P, then Q or their equivalent); 6 Every logically contingent proposition entails every necessary truth; 7 Every logically contingent proposition entails some, but not all, other logically contingent propositions.
- 9 The logical relations between these views go as follows. Where NT = necessarily true; NF = necessarily false; CT = contingently true; CF = contingently false, the relationships are:
 - 1 If NG is the case, then CG, N(NOT-G), and C(NOT-G) are NF.
 - 2 If N(NOT-G) is the case, then NG, CG, and C(NOT-G) are NF.
 - 3 If CG is the case, then NG and N(NOT-G) are NF and C(NOT-G) is CF.
 - 4 If C(NOT-G) is the case, then NG and N(NOT-G) are NF and CG is CF.

- 10 These matters are relevant to arguments to be considered later. It is the case that: (A) A proof of a necessary truth can contain only necessary truths as premises, and (B) A proof of a logically contingent proposition must contain at least one logically contingent proposition among its premises. It is also, of course, true that: (C) No false proposition can be proved, and (D) No argument that contains a false premise is a proof, even if its conclusion is true.
- 11 "Behave" here is an anthropomorphism which unfortunately is seldom recognized as such.
- 12 That this is approximate, and not a basic law, does not matter. Anyone who wants more sophisticated examples is free to supply them.
- 13 Or a feature that follows from its essential features.
- 14 Strictly, essences typically are thought of as defining kinds of things; the view that there are, in addition to essences or kinds of things, also essences of individuals is much more controversial.

8 Nonmonotheistic conceptions of ultimate reality

- 1 Subject to a philosophical qualification noted in a later chapter.
- 2 Technically, impermanence and co-dependent arising.
- 3 Commentary on the Brahma-Sutra, II, 3, 7.
- 4 Pancandasi, III, 23–4.
- 5 Further, Shankara's writings contain a sophisticated version of the view that there are experience-independent physical objects.
- 6 Chandogya Upanishad 3.14.1.
- 7 The passage is from S. Subba Rao, Vedanta Sutras (Madras, 1904; 3.3.29, p. 141); cited in J. Estlin Carpenter, Theism in Medieval India (New Delhi: Oriental Books Reprint Corporation, 1977); first published by Williams and Norgate, London, 1921, with quotations embedded in the text as indicated.
- 8 K. Satchidananda Murty, Reason and Revelation in Advaita Vedanta (Delhi: Motilal Barnasidass, 1974), pp. 3–4. First published by Ahndra University Press and Columbia University Press, 1959.
- 9 Strictly, no term more determinate than, say, substance.
- 10 Strictly, it is the Essay Concerning Human Understanding, Book II (not the later Book IV) account.
- 11 Allowing for a particular historical context.
- 12 Where "the Atman" refers to each "individual person" – the view, of course, entails the remarkable consequence that there is at most only one individual person.
- 13 We can ignore here whether idealistic Oscar is one collection of present images or a temporally sequenced series of collections.
- 14 At least for serious purposes in science and metaphysics.
- 15 I leave "collections of catty images" vague; in fact, there is no replacement for this phrase that satisfies the idealist desiderata of (i) being phenomenologically adequate to our sensory experience and (ii) not referring to what, if it exists, is a physical object.
- 16 Again, for purposes of metaphysics and high religion.
- 17 The question remains, of course, as to what can properly replace such sentences as I am tired, a topic to which we will return when we come to assess Advaita Vedanta's claims.
- 18 Jain doctrine is classically expressed in the Jaina Sutras. Jain tradition is doctrinally far more homogeneous than Buddhist tradition.
- 19 Tattvarthadhigama Sutra, chapter V, sections 29, 30, 31, 38, 41, 42; Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan and Charles A. Moore (eds), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy

- (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1957), p. 256. The Sourcebook is probably still the most accessible source for the passages that it contains.
- 20 Ibid., chapter II, sections 7, 8, 29; Sourcebook, p. 254.
 - 21 This is a Jain analogue of the doctrine of double predestination (some to salvation, some to damnation), albeit without a predestinator.
 - 22 Samayasdra, 325.
 - 23 Atmanusasna, 174.
 - 24 Ibid., chapter X, section 4; Sourcebook, p. 260.
 - 25 Herman Jacobi, trans., Jaina Sutras (New York: Dover Publications, 1962; originally published, 1896) I, 264.
 - 26 Buddhist tradition is far less homogeneous than Jain tradition. While the doctrines that, nirvana aside, nothing is permanent, everything is momentary, and the related thesis that no momentary thing exists independently, come near to being Buddhist orthodoxy, even within Indian Buddhism there is significant doctrinal variety. My focus here is on Theravada Buddhism. The same issues arise for non-Absolutist Mahayana traditions. Absolutist Mahayana tradition is a philosophical sibling, if not twin, to Advaita Vedanta and lies outside the present discussion.
 - 27 Anguttara-nikaya, iii, 134; Sourcebook, pp. 273, 274; the text is Theravadin.
 - 28 Visuddhi-magga, xviii; Sourcebook, pp. 284–5; the text is Theravadin.
 - 29 Or, for Buddhist idealism, sensory contents of elements of simultaneous bundles.
 - 30 Sanmati Tarka, 1.12; Sourcebook, p. 269.
 - 31 Strictly, change requires that the item that changes retain numerical identity over time. Whether this is a matter of permanence, in the sense of the inherent indestructibility that Jainism ascribes to persons, or a beginningless but nonetheless dependent numerical identity over time that persons enjoy according to Vsistaadvaita and Dvaita, or a non-beginningless dependent numerical identity over time that persons enjoy according to the Semitic monotheisms, is irrelevant here. I use the quoted term “permanence” for convenience; let it stand in for something like “numerical identity over time” of any of the sorts just mentioned.
 - 32 For non-idealist Buddhism, there are bundles that contain no states of consciousness (these being the referents of typical physical object terms) and bundles that contain states of consciousness (these being the referents of typical person terms). For the idealist Buddhist, there are only the latter, and typical physical object terms refer to subsets of bundles of states of consciousness (those containing sensory content).
 - 33 If metaphysical identity is necessary, a Buddhist person could not have lived lives other than the one she did live. This raises questions about any alleged freedom such a person could possess.
 - 34 “Getting them right” of course involves more than being able to pass a true–false exam in metaphysics. It involves deep convictions, basic and firmly held beliefs, associated feelings and practices, and the like – “heart knowledge as well as head knowledge” as some would say. But “getting them right” does include getting them right – believing what is true.
 - 35 I use “memory” here as a “success term” without denying that one can think one remembers when one does not (a view quite open to Jainism). If one prefers, let him for “memory” substitute “reliable memory.”
 - 36 If you want to think of various reincarnation “visits” as all comprising a single lifetime, think of the actions as having been done on earlier “visits” than those in which the recompense comes.
 - 37 The role alleged ineffability plays in this notion will be discussed in a later chapter.

9 Arguments against monotheism

- 1 There may be times in between embodiments, for a given person or for all persons in a condition, in which the physical world spends some time at rest.
- 2 See Bruce Reichenbach's discussion in Reincarnation and Karma and the article by Paul Griffiths, referred to in the Annotated reading at the end of the chapter.
- 3 For a possible problem regarding the use of the doctrines of reincarnation and karma as a reply to the problem of evil, see Roy Perrett (ed.), Indian Philosophy of Religion (Dordrecht: Kluwer Academic Publishers), chapters 1 (section starting on p. 13) and 3.
- 4 Other sorts of considerations are considered elsewhere – e.g., in our consideration of the concept of God, and the properties of being omnipotent, being omniscient, and being morally perfect.
- 5 Or Probably, God does not exist or There is evidence against the existence of God or the like. It is not a logically necessary truth that If there is evil then there is evidence against the existence of God.
- 6 Perhaps the assumptions are rendered easier to make if one mistakenly takes there to be such a thing as knowing everything but one thing (being one proposition short of omniscience) and being able to do everything except one thing (being one power short of omnipotence). These assumptions take propositions and powers to be related to one another as are pieces of straw in a haystack (each separable from the others), and this is a dubious view about both propositions and powers. This is so, even if holism (the view that the content of every proposition and power is intrinsically dependent on the content of every other) is also a dubious view about propositions and powers.
- 7 Perhaps a best possible world should be conceived as also “maximizing” other values besides moral worth. My point here is that, since it is moral evil that is relevant to the objection being considered, the idea of a best possible world is at least the idea of a world with “maximal” moral worth, and that such a world will contain no evil.
- 8 Philosophers differ over whether such virtues as fortitude, bravery, courage, and compassion have intrinsic worth – possessing them is a logically necessary condition of being a maturely good moral agent, or merely intrinsic worth, so that fortitude, bravery, courage, and compassion are valuable in the way that taking bitter medicine may be valuable – as a remedy for something unpleasant but not as something that is good for its own sake. If any evil-requiring virtue has intrinsic worth as an essential element in a fully mature good character, then (N1)'s denial that a best possible world – if that notion makes sense – could contain no evil is mistaken.
- 9 One can put this premise instead as 2*. If there are apparently pointless evils, then probably there is no God, with the conclusion stated as 3*. Probably God does not exist. Similar alterations could be made in arguments to come. For simplicity these variations will not be explicitly dealt with, but the discussion applies equally to them.
- 10 For some relevant considerations concerning actually pointless or gratuitous evil, see the current author's “Divine Existence and Gratuitous Evil,” Religious Studies, Vol. 25, pp. 15–30.
- 11 It is one thing to appeal to mystery and another to possess the minimal modesty involved in recognizing that the range of knowledge of an omniscient being might include things that exceed our comprehension.
- 12 Since it is on behalf of an argument we will reject that we make this assumption, its relative unclarity will not be a problem for anything we want to argue for.
- 13 The definitions of pointless evil that follow all refer to our knowledge and our conceptual efforts – to what we can think up. An importantly different sort of definition would eliminate all such reference. Roughly, on such a definition, a pointless evil would be one that served no point, whatever we thought about the matter.

- 14 Or, minimally, did not act wrongly.
- 15 It is controversial whether there are any strictly unimaginably pointless evils. For any evil you like, one could claim that it is a necessary condition of some specific great good – say, the salvation of ten thousand persons – though one admitted that one did not know in what manner it served as such a condition. Even if there was no reason to think this was true of that evil, it does not follow that (a) it is not imaginable that it be true, and hence (b) that there may be some great good such that, had we more information, we could see it was necessary to that good, or (c) that even if we are not bright enough to see the connection between a great good and a particular evil even were the connection explained to us, there might nonetheless be one. The point is that strictly being an unimaginably pointless evil is tantamount to being an evil that necessarily has no point or being an evil that would be pointless in any possible world in which it occurred. In order not to make things more complex, I will not directly enter into these matters here. I take it that, to the degree that we understand the notion of being an unimaginably pointless evil, there is no good reason to think that it fits any actual evil.
- 16 One could add or S's being given the chance to come to have Q, provided she acts rightly to the definition.
- 17 Again, one could say there probably are actually pointless evils or it is reasonable to think that there are actually pointless evils or it is reasonable to think, and unreasonable not to think, that there are actually pointless evils in stating this premise. The discussion should make clear what might properly be said about these variations.
- 18 See previous note.
- 19 Some have argued that if there are evils that are either apparently pointless or neither apparently pointful nor apparently pointless, the existence of those evils, or of our evidential situation regarding them, is evidence against God's existence. One way of putting their point is this: the existence of some evil E which is, relative to our knowledge, either apparently pointless or neither apparently pointful nor apparently pointless constitutes an evil E* distinct from E, and the existence of such evils as E* is evidence against the existence of God. Call an evil that is either apparently pointless or else neither apparently pointful nor apparently pointless a murky evil. The same issues arise about murky evils as arise about non-murky evils in a way that seems not to bring about any distinctively new considerations.
- 20 Should suspend judgment, at any rate, if our total evidence is that the evils in question are of the sort indicated. The same consideration applies regarding 2a below.
- 21 See Annotated reading at end of chapter.
- 22 Or embodied ones of whom we have no trace; the possible scenario sketched here speaks of unembodied agents simply to link up with accounts of angels and demons.
- 23 One could go on for some time considering possible points and then eliminating any plausible candidates by some further complication of the example. I shall simply assume that any plausible points such evils might serve can be dealt with by suitable qualifications. If this is false, there is less to the critic's claim than if it is true.
- 24 A Rowean will grant that if we have reason to think that God exists, this claim is false. She also is likely to deny that there is any such reason.
- 25 Or something much like it; nothing hangs here on its being exactly 1–3 and 4–6 that capture a Rowean's position, so long as something similar does so.
- 26 A Rowean will grant that if we have reason to think that God exists, this claim is false. She also is likely to deny that there is any such reason.
- 27 See previous note.
- 28 Unless, of course, its having a point, or not, is itself a matter of how it relates to our cognitive states.

- 29 Strictly, this is not accurate. Suppose that having fortitude is a good, that one can have this virtue only if one has borne pain well, and hence that it is logically impossible that one have the virtue without there having been pains, and that pains are evils. Still, it is not necessary that there have been the particular pains that there were; other pains presumably would have done as well. So the obtaining of the actually endured pains was not, strictly speaking, logically necessary for fortitude to obtain. They were merely some among various possible pains that would so serve; in such circumstances we might say that the actual pains were disjunctively necessary for fortitude – it was necessary that they, or something similar (i.e., other pains) obtain. Similar considerations apply generally to cases of evils being necessary for goods. It does matter here whether the existence of fortitude in John does provide sufficient point for there being pains which John bears; the point here is simply to be clear about the sense in which it can be true that Evil E's obtaining is a logically necessary condition of good G obtaining. A relevant complication is this: might John's bearing pains have a point if they provide the opportunity for John to develop fortitude, even if he does not do so? Might a relevant point-giving good be simply John's having the opportunity to develop fortitude, whether he does so or not? Obviously, a similar question will arise in the case of other evils and goods.
- 30 One might propose here something like (P*) If there is an omniscient God then it is immensely probable – or at least more probable than .5 – that there will be no pointless evils. But why anyone should think (P*) true without thinking (P) true is unclear, and in any case if (P*) is true, it is necessarily true, and if (P) is not a necessary truth the prospects for (P*) being a necessary truth look bleak.
- 31 Due to Peter Van Inwagen, An Essay on Free Will (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983).
- 32 The suggestion here follows an interesting discussion by Peter Van Inwagen.
- 33 Surviving no doubt would require restrictions on randomness in the sense that there would need to be events that were not randomness cases; one could also stipulate that in a chancey world it was random which events were random – i.e., second-order randomness was present as well as first-order.
- 34 See note 29.
- 35 If one insists that anything having to do with personal maturity – flourishing as a person – is part of morality, I have no objections; I will then make my point using some such terminology as morality of common grace and morality of special grace.
- 36 Or have good reason to believe, or the like.
- 37 Or, again, we have good reason to believe that there are, or it is likely that there are, or it is unreasonable not to grant that there are, or the like.
- 38 Or have good reason to believe, or the like.
- 39 See previous note.
- 40 For example, I take the following to be a necessary truth: For any enumerative class K of things, if K has any purely intrinsic worth, its members distributively have intrinsic worth (I mean by an enumerative class one that is defined by its extension). Further, I take natural species to be enumerative classes.
- 41 It is hard to see why the amount of animal suffering makes any evidential difference. Psychologically, perhaps, some might find it easier to believe that God has a good reason for allowing (say) one-hundredth of the animal suffering God has allowed, but not for allowing the actual amount. But that is purely psychological; a sentiment, perhaps, but not a reason. The same holds concerning the number of disappearing species. Presumably if it is wrong of God to allow species to disappear, then it is worse of God to allow many to disappear than to allow a few to disappear. The basic questions remain whether the disappearance of a species is an inherently bad thing, and if so whether God could have a morally sufficient reason for allowing this sort of inherently bad thing.

- 42 Simplicity here can be a matter of kinds of things, number of things, kinds of laws, number of laws, combinations of the above, etc.; none of these ways of understanding simplicity will make (N) true.
- 43 God of course, on this account, loses purely intrinsic value if God creates – but this is no real loss – God has just as much intrinsic value as before, and in addition comes to have extrinsic value.
- 44 Moral value is another matter.
- 45 Much of it, of course, occurred prior to there being any human beings. The view that we should exercise considerably more ecological caution in the future than we have in the past does not presuppose or entail that the disappearance of a great many species provides evidence against the existence of God.
- 46 The (presumably uncontroversial) assumption being that an omniscient God could have prevented the relevant species from becoming extinct.
- 47 Again allowing for such replacements for “There is no” as “We can think of no” or “To the best of our knowledge, and after careful reflection, we can discern no,” and the like.
- 48 At this point, the question again arises as to whether the notion of as much natural value as it is possible that there be is not like the highest possible integer, so that any objection based on appeal to it is self-refuting.
- 49 In the sense intended, having natural worth entails having intrinsic worth.
- 50 There will, of course, come a point where someone claims that there is intrinsic unexchangeable irreplaceable worth to there being spotted owls or snail darters and that any God who lets it be true that there no longer are any such things deserves to live in Sing Sing Prison for ever. It is possible to postpone that point for some time, do a lot of interesting philosophical (and presumably theological) work before one gets there. Further, it will be extremely hard if not impossible to show that, say, spotted owls have unexchangeable natural worth.
- 51 Earlier Judaism was in fact highly reserved regarding any notion of afterlife for human persons. Allowing a human person to cease to exist did not seem to them to be something God could not quite properly do. This, of course, does not entail that they thought that God could properly, say, obliterate Abraham when he reached the age of forty and “replace” him with a biologically-forty-year-old Abraham*.
- 52 Critics tend here to leap to “the hard cases” – to, say, a human whose intellectual capacities are profoundly limited, less than those typically ascribed to a mature chimpanzee. But the hard cases are emotionally hard (it is psychologically very difficult to think of, let alone experience, biologically human creatures with such limitations) and morally hard (what do we owe such humans, besides not causing them suffering) and intellectually hard (because it is both difficult to think clearly about such matters and controversial about what we actually know regarding such cases – how accurate are our judgments regarding their capacities – and about what future medicine may enable us to do for them). But the critic presumably, in the sort of push-come-to-shove scenarios that are of some help in clarifying thought about such matters, will agree that there is an important difference between the case in which (i) one can save the life of only one of two biological humans – one “normal” child and one of capacities of the sort described earlier, and (ii) one can save the life of only one of two “normal” children. The question as to what to do is much harder in (ii) than in (i). It is hard to explain that fact anything like adequately without accepting something very like the view that persons (defined in terms of their intellectual, moral, and religious capacities) have baseline intrinsic worth. “Person” is not a biologically definable term. It is not at all clear to me that anything short of a person has BIW, or that the critic can both deny this and adequately justify the claim that things that are not persons possess intrinsic natural worth. But going into all of this would require a book on moral philosophy.

- 53 Claims about BIW starting at the level of persons (and stopping there as well since there can be non-human as well as human persons) will be called “speciesist” and get one booted in various contemporary circles. Nonetheless, name-calling aside, the perspective that so limits BIW seems eminently defensible.
- 54 Alan Donagan’s The Theory of Morality (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977) and his Choice: The Essential Element in Action (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1987) are very good here.
- 55 Obviously there are other versions of (b)-strategies, each requiring attention on its own. Even a book-length treatment of some of them would leave out others.
- 56 Reasonable, of course, in this sense: if it is reasonable to accept P, then it is not also reasonable to accept not-P or to suspend judgment regarding P.
- 57 With the usual allowance for variant versions concerning probability, reasonability of concluding that, and so on.

10 Arguments for monotheism

- 1 Proposition P entails proposition Q if and only if P, but not Q is a contradiction. (e.g., There are two whales in the bay entails There is at least one whale in the bay, since to assert the former and deny the latter is to contradict yourself). Another way of putting this is: P entails Q if and only if P, therefore Q is a necessary truth.
- 2 George Mavrodes, Belief in God: A Study in the Epistemology of Religion (New York: Random House, 1970), chapter 2.
- 3 These examples are due to ibid.
- 4 For those not aware of the history of the basketball franchise the Boston Celtics, Bill Russell was the center for the Celtics teams that won eleven of thirteen championships, and the greatest defensive center (arguably, the greatest player) ever to play the game.
- 5 Defending this understanding goes beyond the scope of this book. For a beginning, see Arthur Pap, Semantics and Necessary Truth (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959), chapter 7, “The linguistic theory of the apriori,” and Alvin Plantinga, The Nature of Necessity (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1974).
- 6 For an accessible review of different relevant views, see Michael Loux, Metaphysics (London: Routledge, 1998).
- 7 If you want another counterexample and are willing to have it more complicated than our other examples, here are two: For any formal system S, if S is adequate for number theory (e.g., if its axioms are strong enough to entail Peano’s postulates) there will be some formula F that is both expressible in S and undecidable in S and its corollary For any formal system S, if S is adequate for number theory, there can be no proof within S of the claim S is consistent. These are hardly uninformative or mathematically trivial.
- 8 Due to Alvin Plantinga; see The Nature of Necessity, op. cit., and God, Freedom, and Evil (New York: Random House, 1974). The former contains the full-dress, and the latter a streamlined, version of the argument.
- 9 Note that, on the principle For all x, if x is actual then x is possible that the actual world is (also) a possible world.
- 10 Note that to be true in all possible worlds and to be included in every maximal proposition are the same.
- 11 I am using “empirical” here very broadly.
- 12 This strategy may also seem attractive if one wishes to hedge one’s bet regarding the interpretation of Scripture on how God and the universe are related.

- 13 Medieval theories of relations is an interesting topic all by itself – one that would take us far afield from our current concerns. Mark Henninger, Relations: Medieval Theories, 1250–1325 (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989) provides an excellent introduction.
- 14 Some member of the domain must also stand in this relationship only backwardly – must depend on something else but nothing else depends on it.
- 15 At De Caelo XII 258 Aquinas offers a series of claims relevant to his Five Ways. It seems worth including them here. Again, we begin with definitions:

Definition A: X has non-derivative necessary existence if and only if X does not exist is self-contradictory.

Definition B: X has derivative necessary existence if and only if X cannot naturally (without the action of an omnipotent being) cease to exist.

Definition C: X cannot naturally cease to exist if and only if X contains no matter or the matter that X contains cannot have any essence other than the one that it has.

Definition D: X has the power of not existing if and only if X is such that X exists only if X has the essence it has but it is possible that the stuff that X is made of come to have some other essence.

Definition E: X generates from Y at T if and only if There is a Y that exists at T-1 and X at T contains the matter that was in Y at T.

Definition F: X corrupts at T if and only if There is a Y such that Y exists at T+1 and the matter that was in X at T is in Y at T+1.

Definition G: X is a natural body only if X is capable of generation and corruption.

Aquinas tells us:

- 1 If X always exists, then X has the power always to exist.
- 2 If X has the power always to exist, then X lacks the power not to always exist.
- 3 If X always exists then X lacks the power not to always exist. (from 1 and 2)

- 4 If X lacks the power not to always exist then X does not generate or corrupt.
- 5 If X generates or corrupts then X does not lack the power not always to exist.
- 6 If X has the power not always to exist then X does not always exist.
- 7 If X generates or corrupts then X does not always exist.

Also involved seems the idea that, in some sense, Necessarily, in any infinite time all possibilities are realized, though it is difficult to think of any reading of this claim on which it is true.

- 16 More fully: for X to change or move is for X to go from potentiality to actuality or from actuality to potentiality regarding quantity, quality, or place.
- 17 The existence of something with causal powers – the actual capacity to bring about changes in other things – that was not itself changed in so doing – might, by itself, have slight religious relevance, but of course Aquinas has no intention of limiting himself to this one conclusion.
- 18 And animal mind, if such there be – we need not enter into that matter here.
- 19 The notion of infinity is of course complex. A nice introduction to various relevant notions is A. W. Moore, The Infinite (London: Routledge, 1991).
- 20 At Summa Ia 46 2–7.

- 21 The strategy here is called Conditional Proof. You assume that P, show that P plus a set of truths entails Q, and conclude If P then Q.
- 22 Let *P = possibly,P; Cx = x corrupts. Then another way of stating the criticism is this: Aquinas shifts quantifiers illegitimately, going from: $A = (x)*Cx$ to $B = *(x)Cx$.
- 23 Let $Ex/t = x$ exists at t; $(Et) =$ there is a t. Then the criticism is that Aquinas illegitimately goes from: $D = (x)(Et) \text{ not-}Ex/t$ to $E = (Et)(x) \text{ not-}Ex/t$.
- 24 The Fourth Way is a variety of the moral argument for God's existence, and we will look at it briefly when we consider religion and morality.
- 25 It does not follow that being morally perfect is, like being omnipotent and omniscient, an essential property of God. One might (Noel Hendrickson did) suggest that only always wanting very badly to exist would be just as good for these purposes as being morally perfect. This is a property a morally imperfect being might well have. I leave working out the answer to this objection as an exercise for the reader.
- 26 Here, "God" is being used as a name, not a definite description.
- 27 ST Ia 15 2 suggests the possibility of the reading that we do not give here.
- 28 Aquinas is criticized for making an inference from A to B below:

- A. Every generable thing is such that an intelligent agent directs it to seek its own flourishing.
- B. There is an end that all generable beings together are directed to seek.

On the present reading, no such inference is required.

- 29 Sacred Books, Vol. 48, pp. 170–1.
- 30 Ibid., 165 – cf. p. 171 that notes that intelligent agents whom we observe to cause things also have emotions – “are connected with pleasure and the like.”
- 31 Ramanuja thinks of the world as God's body, but a body that depends on God for its existence, in contrast to human bodies in relation to human minds.
- 32 Ibid., p. 173.
- 33 Ibid.
- 34 After an introductory first section, sections 2 through 8 of the Dialogues deal with a dialogue concerning the argument from design. Section 9 deals with an argument that is a mix of the ontological and cosmological arguments, sections 10 and 11 with the problem of evil, and section 12 with natural religion. The present author has discussed all of these issues in Hume's philosophy in Hume's "Inexplicable Mystery": His Views on Religion (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988).
- 35 Two points: there is also a version of the argument that has as a premise the orderliness of the physical world as a whole, rather than the orderliness of particular sorts of natural objects; the fact that we can change the sort of order we find in nature by selective breeding in no way discounts the fact that we did not bring about the order that makes such breeding possible. Both varieties of the argument are discussed further in Hume's "Inexplicable Mystery."

11 Monotheism and religious experience

- 1 Using “a holy, powerful being” as a brief description of the content of monotheistic religious experiences.
- 2 For other examples, see Sir Alister Hardy, The Spiritual Nature of Man (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1979).
- 3 And, of course, claims logically entailed by those claims.
- 4 A fact that is curiously ignored by those who have discussed the similar principle.

- 5 To describe something completely is to state every truth about that thing. There is nothing whatever such that any human person can completely describe it. Other than the unsurprising fact that we are not omniscient, it is hard to see that anything of particular philosophical interest follows from this.
- 6 See Caroline Franks Davis, The Evidential force of Religious Experience (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989). A strength of this book is its excellent discussion of social science explanations of religious belief. An unnecessary weakness is its assumption that all religious experiences are the same, or of the same sort.
- 7 For what it is worth, conceptual, moral, and aesthetic experiences are more like religious experiences in these respects than like sensory experiences.
- 8 Here is one version of an evidential argument from religious experience:
 - 1 Experiences occur which are a matter of their subjects at least seeming to experience God.
 - 2 If experiences of this sort are not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed, then their occurrence is evidence that God exists.
 - 3 Experiences of this sort are not canceled or counterbalanced or compromised or contradicted or confuted or logically consumed or empirically consumed.

Hence:

- 4 These experiences are evidence that God exists, (from 1–3)

It continues:

- 5 If these experiences occur in various cultures, and at various times, to people of various backgrounds and socio-economic status, their evidential force is increased.
- 6 These experiences occur in various cultures, and at various times, to people of various backgrounds and socio-economic status.

Hence:

- 7 Their evidential force is increased.

While the claims that appear in the premises of this argument are interesting, controversial, and – in the present author's view – entirely defensible, discussing them in detail would take us far afield – into discussions, for example, of the similarity or otherwise of at least apparent experiences of God as these occur in different times and places and religious traditions.

- 9 A final issue should be mentioned. If one sees a cup on the table and not unreasonably comes to believe that There is a cup on the table, in all strictness one believes more than one's current experience tells. The cup one believes is on the table, if it exists at all, is an enduring thing; one's current experience is momentary. It is not a matter of pure report of sensory experiences if one looks again and has an experience with the same sensory phenomenology that one says that the same cup is still there; it is logically possible that the old cup has passed away and been replaced by a new one. Cups have other sides, and one sees only this side; perhaps one sees only a cup façade. The point is not to provide a basis for skepticism about cups, but simply to note that even a very modest claim about an ordinary object strictly goes beyond the experiential information one currently possesses.

Underdetermination looms larger in scientific theory where there will always be more than one possible way of explaining what is observed, so that claims that various sorts of theoretical entities exist are underdetermined by the data on the basis of which such claims are made. Even religious experiences of a phenomenologically thick sort – Isaiah in the temple in the presence of an awesome holy being in whose presence he senses his own sinfulness and need for forgiveness, for example – underdetermine the claims, for example, that God is omnipotent and omniscient. In religion and theology, as in everyday sensory experience and scientific theory, conceptual experiences join with sensory or religious experiences in more fully determining the concepts used to describe the objects of experience. How this goes in any given case is likely to be complex and fascinating. The next step would be to ask what reasons monotheism can supply for claiming that God is omnipotent and omniscient. But that is another story.

12 Arguments concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions (1)

- 1 See, for example, the selections from Ramanuja in Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan and Charles Moore (eds), A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1957) or George Thibaut, The Vedanta Sutras (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1890–1904), vols 34, 38, 48 of the Sacred Books of the East. These volumes contain the aphorisms of Badarayana with the commentaries.
- 2 That is, no more than one of the alternatives can be true, and (as we shall see) there are other relevant views besides these three.
- 3 A bit more fully: I take dualism to hold that X is a person if and only if X is a self-conscious being, where X is a self-conscious being if and only if X is sometimes self-conscious and X when not self-conscious nonetheless has the capacity to become so. Further, X continues to be a person only if X is a person and X shall be self-conscious in the future. Dualism, then, holds that being self-conscious is not a physical property, that persons are self-conscious mental substances whose essence is (or includes) having self-consciousness, and that no mental substance is a physical substance or an abstract object.
- 4 Philosophers often talk as if the notion of a mental property is obscure and the notion of a physical property is lucid. But when one comes to actual definitions of “physical property” the supposed clarity of the idea becomes shy and hides. Some philosophers talk as if the notion of being self-conscious were itself somehow deeply obscure. There are views (and so much the worse for them) on which it is hard to see how anything could be or become self-conscious, but being self-conscious is a clearer notion than is being physical.
- 5 For example, C. J. Du Casse, Alan Donagan, Alvin Plantinga, Howard Robinson, John Foster, Frank Jackson, etc.
- 6 Whether X and Y are fully qualitatively identical entails X and Y are numerically identical is a matter of controversy that we need not enter.
- 7 If the relationship between qualitative so-called identity and numerical identity are not clear, one might consider some relevant necessary truths.

It is helpful, in understanding qualitative “identity” and numerical identity to see how these concepts are related; a bit of reflection should be sufficient to see that each of the following claims is true (indeed, not possibly false, and so necessarily true).

N1 X is nearly fully identical to Y does not entail X is numerically identical to Y. (Identical twins are possible.)

- N2 X at t is numerically identical to Y at t1 does not entail X at t is fully qualitatively identical to Y at T1. (It is logically impossible that anything at one time can be fully qualitatively identical to anything at another time; the definition of full qualitative identity, including as it does spatial and temporal properties, rules that out.)
- N3 X at t is numerically identical to Y at t1 does not entail X at t is nearly fully qualitatively identical to Y at T1. (A thing can remain the same thing and yet undergo non-essential change.)
- N4 X at t is fully qualitatively identical to Y at T1 entails X at t is numerically identical to Y at t1 and entails X at t is not numerically identical to Y at t1. (The claim that things that exist at different times are fully qualitatively identical is self-contradictory; see comment after N2.)
- N5 X at t is nearly fully qualitatively identical to Y at T1 does not entail X at t is numerically identical to Y at t1. (Something at one time can be very, very similar to something at another time without being identical to it.)
- N6 For all X, X at T is fully qualitatively identical (and hence nearly fully qualitatively identical) to X at T. (Anything at a time T is qualitatively identical to itself at T.)
- N7 For all X, if X at T is numerically identical to Y at T then X at T is fully qualitatively identical to (and hence nearly fully qualitatively identical to Y at T). (See comment after N6.)
- 8 Where X is the closest thing to Y does not entail X is Y.
- 9 That is, each substance in the series exists for two moments, etc.
- 10 Other possibilities are sometimes proposed – e.g., Bertrand Russell’s neutral monism on which mental and physical properties are somehow reducible to other properties that are neither mental nor physical. I doubt that this particular view is defensible. Nonetheless, the discussion deals with the views most relevant to Jainism and Theravada Buddhism, and does not pretend to be a comprehensive discussion of all logically possible accounts of minds and bodies.
- 11 Indeed, one can intelligently argue about which of these alternatives is the Theravada view. Our arguments will be concerned with the structure of the view, and not depend on which of these alternative accounts of what makes up that structure is the right reading of the Theravada account.
- 12 That is, a person(1) can be composed of a set A of states and a set B of states such that were A to exist without B, A would be a person, and were B to exist without A, B would be a person.
- 13 “Critique,” of course, need not mean “refutation, or attempt to refute;” it does mean that here.
- 14 Whatever relation R allegedly must hold between composite nonendurers in order for them to belong to a single succession such that their being so related gives rise to commonsense descriptions such as “stages of the life of a single person” – resemblance, causality, resemblance-and-causality, or whatever – is such that for any composite nonendurer C at T, both composite nonendurer *C at time T1 and composite nonendurer *C at T1 may bear R to C. Hence both are identical to C if either is. Being distinct themselves, *C and *C cannot both be identical to C. But then neither is identical to C. Thus there being *C and *C at T1 prevents the succession of bundles to which C belongs from continuing, whereas (on a Buddhist-type account) that succession would have continued had only *C, or only *C, borne R to C.

- 15 Read it as saying that Whether persons are substances or collections, the substance or collection that is identical to me exists now; neither a Jain-type nor a Buddhist-type account of persons is built into the first premise.
- 16 Cloning a person does not destroy her; it simply gives her a twin. I have a clone at T does not entail I do not exist at T; hence premise 6 is true. This remains the case even if we replace the notion of a clone by the notion of a *clone so that a *clone is either another person cloned from me or something created ex nihilo that is an exact copy of what a clone of me would be (and also bears R to me).
- 17 Justice, if you prefer.
- 18 Save, perhaps, for the unorthodox, extremely minority-status Buddhist Personalists.
- 19 I assume for convenience that the act was itself momentary; otherwise there will also be a problem about the identity of the original agent of the action.
- 20 See previous note.
- 21 I take it to be evident that logically necessary truths are internal to all positions, including those that deny them. What is true in all possible worlds is also true in all possible positions; some positions deny this, and in so doing deny what renders them possibly true positions; so they are necessarily false positions.
- 22 For example, is there within Buddhist metaphysical resources any relation R such that one person(1) bearing R to another person(1) will tie them together into a person(2) in any sense in which a person(2) actually would be a person? Memory relations obviously won't do – Person(1)X did A and person(1)Y remembers having done A assumes Person(1)X and person(1)Y belong to a single person(2) and so cannot be used to explain what being a single person(2) amounts to. Resemblance seems irrelevant. Causality is a common candidate, but of exactly what sort (lots of causal relations won't do) ? I doubt that any such analysis is even plausible, but that is another matter.
- 23 It may be helpful here to notice a possible difference between composite nonendurers and composite endurers. All of the elements of a composite nonendurer exist simultaneously. Thus it may be possible for them to be so related that while singly none of them is an organism, together they comprise an organism, albeit a very brief one. The elements of a composite endurer do not exist simultaneously. By the time one element arrives, its preceding elements are all gone. So the elements of a composite endurer cannot be so related as to comprise an organism. A composite endurer is simply and only a succession of composite nonendurers. If each such nonendurer in a succession is an organism, then it is a succession of organisms.
- 24 Remember that E1 and E2 are composite nonendurers that exist at different times.
- 25 The temptation is to think that because the elements of a composite nonendurer can be an organism (something somehow more than just its parts), so can composite endurers be organisms. But even if the former is true, the latter is not; a succession of organisms is a succession of organisms, and is not itself an organism. To think otherwise is to embrace confusion.
- 26 Strictly, of course, if P entails Q and Q is logically inconsistent or self-contradictory, then P is also logically inconsistent or self-contradictory – i.e., necessarily false. Hence not only is the complexity view not true; it is not even logically possible that it be true.
- 27 I think that there are only two logically possible accounts of the metaphysical structure (so to say) of persons. This is argued briefly in "A Defense of Dualism," Faith and Philosophy, Vol. 12, No. 4, October 1995, pp. 548–66, in an issue that includes all of the main papers read at the 1994 Notre Dame Conference on the Philosophy of Mind.

- 28 For example, the Jain view, fleshed out, includes the implausible claims that Every person is inherently omniscient, though exercise of this capacity is frustrated by our being embodied and It is impossible that anything cause a person to cease to exist, though a person can be caused not to be embodied in the body she presently occupies (or in any body at all). That our existence involves latent omniscience and necessary ontological independence are claims quite independent of anything discussed here, and I should not like to have to defend them.
- 29 That is, if Sam at T is identical to Sam at T1, then necessarily, Sam at T is identical to Sam at T1 – which is to be distinguished from Sam at T enjoys logically necessary existence, as does Sam at T1.
- 30 James W. Cornman and Keith Lehrer, Philosophical Problems and Arguments: An Introduction (New York: Macmillan, 1974), pp. 238–9.
- 31 Materialists who are property dualists are often willing to grant that physical things come in at least two kinds – those capable of self-consciousness and those not (or at least those capable of consciousness and those not – though if the not capable of consciousness/capable of consciousness distinction is kind-defining or essential, it is hard to see why the same should not be said regarding the not capable of self-consciousness/capable of self-consciousness distinction).
- 32 Some philosophers have embraced the view that there are abstract objects (immaterial substances not capable of consciousness) as well as material substances. But they have continued to reject the idea that there are any mental substances.
- 33 This is, of course, perfectly compatible with determinism being false.

13 Arguments concerning nonmonotheistic conceptions (2)

- 1 In fact, the terminology used to refer to the relevant experiences is not as neat as these characterizations suggest. For example, Jainism not infrequently used “nirvana” to refer to kevala experiences.
- 2 One might add something along the lines of S has seen both that he had E and that it is logically impossible that he have E and P be false. Nothing argued here will depend on whether we add this last consideration or not, so long as it is not the case that Chandra has E but believes P, not on the basis of his having had E, but on some other basis. Even if E is self-authenticating regarding a proposition P, and person S has E, E does not self-authenticate P to S if the only reason that S accepts P is not that S had E and E fits a description such that if E occurs then this is (conclusive) evidence for P. For example, if S would otherwise not accept P unless his great-grandfather had asserted P, and would have accepted P on that basis even without having had E, then even if E is conclusive evidence for P, S does not accept P on that basis and so E is not for S self-authenticating regarding P.
- 3 One might put self-authentication along these lines: E is self-authenticating to Chandra regarding P if and only if (i) Chandra cannot be mistaken about a belief B that Chandra evidentially rests on his experience E, (ii) B cannot be false if Chandra has E, (iii) it is logically impossible that Chandra be wrong about whether Chandra has E, and (iv) Chandra believes that he had E. Again, nothing we say here would be changed if we characterized self-authentication along these lines.
- 4 These are only one way of putting these views, and do not exhaust the views central to these traditions. But they are accurate and representative, fully fair for illustrative purposes here.
- 5 Even if some claim is knowable only by someone who has an enlightenment experience it does not follow that it is true only if someone has an enlightenment

- experience. In fact, the relevant notion of enlightenment experience requires that such experiences essentially involve discovering what has been true all along.
- 6 Not at any rate so long as they think the doctrines they favor to be logically contingent truths.
 - 7 I assume that we both have sufficient evidence that we are seeing a coin of some sort.
 - 8 With the addition, of course, of claims about consciousness and memory.
 - 9 I think that they are also reasonably accepted, save by Advaita Vedantins who claim that all of what could be said on their behalf is “sublated” and so trumped by enlightenment experience.
 - 10 We will not worry here about second-order conscious states – e.g., one’s being aware that one at least seems to perceive a tree or is having a headache similar to the one she had yesterday.
 - 11 If there are genuine moral experiences – awarenesses of obligations, for example – they are recognitions of the truth about what one ought to do, whether one is so inclined or not. If there are genuine aesthetic experiences – awareness of beauty, for example – they are recognitions of what is beautiful, whether one thought so or not. They are neither introspective nor sensory. Nor are they relevant to our concerns here.
 - 12 One cannot show that some list of principles of experiential evidence is a complete list, so even showing that, say, forty-seven principles are such that, if any one of them is the right one, enlightenment experience is not evidence for religious belief, would leave open the worry that there was one more principle which was the right one and on it enlightenment experience was evidence. Of course the worry might be small.
 - 13 Philosophers who agree with the rest of what is said here may think that putting the matter in terms of evidence is not quite correct; it won’t matter for our purposes whether speaking of evidence is exactly right here. For example, those who think we cannot be wrong about such states will want to talk about something stronger than evidence, which will not affect our basic point.
 - 14 Another answer is that claims that a multiplicity of persons and physical objects exist are somehow self-contradictory, all relational claims are self-contradictory, the notion of a substance (physical or mental) is self-contradictory, or the like. But there seem to be no very good arguments for such accusations.
 - 15 The question arises as to whether states is the right word – don’t states have to be states of something? But similar questions arise about such terms as qualities (of what?), events (aren’t events matters of substances coming to gain and/or lose qualities?), processes (don’t these occur to something?), and so on.
 - 16 René Descartes, “Meditations on First Philosophy,” Meditation II, in E.S.H. Haldane and G.R.T. Ross (eds), The Philosophical Works of Descartes, Vol. I (London: Dover Publications, 1931), p. 150. The original edition of Haldane and Ross appeared in 1911 and the first edition of the Meditations appeared in 1641.
 - 17 The Philosophical Works of Descartes, Vol. II, p. 30. The passage comes at the beginning of the “Reply to the Second Objection.”
 - 18 Ibid., Vol. I, p. 150. The passage comes from a section entitled “Argument Demonstrating the Existence of God and the Distinction Between Soul and Body, Drawn Up in Geometrical Fashion,” Definition V, at the end of the “Reply to the Second Objection.”
 - 19 One sort of dualism will take being self-conscious to be the nature of a person; others opt for being capable of self-consciousness, and sometimes being so.
 - 20 Tattvarthadhigama Sutra, chapter V, sections 29, 30, 31, 38, 41, 42; Sourcebook, p. 256.

- 21 Ibid., chapter II, sections 7, 8, 29; Sourcebook, p. 254.
- 22 Chapter II, section 10.
- 23 Samayasdra, 325.
- 24 Atmanusasna, 174.
- 25 Sourcebook, p. 547.
- 26 G. Thibaut, trans., The Vedanta Sutras with the Commentary by Ramanuja (Delhi: Motilal Barnasidass Reprint, 1962; originally published by Oxford University Press, 1904), pp. 48, 55, 56.
- 27 Ibid., p. 56.
- 28 Ramanuja also takes self-awareness to occur in sensory experience – a view that Jainism and (with qualifications) Descartes share.
- 29 Thibaut, I, i, 1; Sourcebook, p. 547.
- 30 Ibid., p. 58.
- 31 Ibid., p. 43.
- 32 David Hume, A Treatise of Human Nature, Book One, Part IV, Section VI, “Of Personal Identity,” p. 252.
- 33 Anguttara-nikaya, iii, 134; Sourcebook, pp. 273, 274; the text is Theravadin.
- 34 Visuddhi-magga xviii; Sourcebook, pp. 284–5; the text is Theravadin.
- 35 Sangutta-nikaya iii, 66; Sourcebook, p. 280.
- 36 Substantialists nonetheless have two advantages in the dispute. Hume admits that we believe that there are enduring substances and has to offer a painfully distended account of our having that belief. There is reason to take the substantialist report form as the natural one – the one we in fact use in describing such experience. Further, even if it were to be proved that the non-substantialist report form should be used, this – because of Locke’s point – would not establish, or even provide any evidence for, the non-substantialist point. So if there is a way around the objections offered here to appeals to introspective (etc.) experience, the advantage lies with the substantialists. Still, the weight falls on the results of asking which view can explain memory, responsibility, self-consciousness, and the like. Appeal to enlightenment and meditative experience is made by both sides, as we have noted.

14 Religion and morality

- 1 Or the moral principle if there is but one.
- 2 An Anselmian theist could do this too, but it is hard to see what the motivation would be.
- 3 Other than God.
- 4 Strictly, one needs to add here “without morally sufficient reason.” It is left to the reader to consider the relevance to the argument of adding this needed qualification.
- 5 Except, if you like, that God exists and has the nature that God has.
- 6 Indeed, any two necessary truths mutually entail one another. Further, since each truth about Tess’s thoughts, by hypothesis, follows from a necessary truth, it is necessarily true, and so entails every truth about every thought that God has. So construed, God’s existence, nature, and thought seem as much determined by Tess’s as the reverse.
- 7 One need not put logical fatalism in somewhat monotheistic dress; it is the doctrine that all truths are necessary and all falsehoods contradictions, and God exists, for all logical fatalism cares, can be among the latter.
- 8 This is metaphysical libertarianism, to be distinguished from political views that use the same term.

- 9 For the argument's origin, see Peter Van Inwagen, An Essay on Free Will (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983).
- 10 Strictly, of course, sentences like "The past entails the future" are shorthand for sentences like "True propositions about the past entail the true propositions about the future."
- 11 That Sue is obligated to do A and Sue does A entails Sue causes B do not entail Sue is obligated to cause B. Like everything in philosophy, this example – and any other – will be challenged by someone. If one accepts at least some versions of so-called deontic logic, the entailments will hold. If they did hold, then this wouldn't be what the critic of the Control Principle says it is – an incorrect principle that is analogous to the Control Principle.
- 12 That state of affairs A obtains entails that state of affairs B obtains if and only if the proposition A obtains entails the proposition B obtains.
- 13 In fact, incompatibilists often hold that were determinism true, no one would, strictly speaking, act at all, since Necessarily, if A is an action by Karen, then Karen is free relative to performing A.
- 14 There are problems with this sort of claim, to be noted later.
- 15 Strictly, given a set of propositions for which the laws are truth conditions.
- 16 Or at least to approximate this goal – sufficient ingenuity can fit a lot into this scope, and we may have left something interesting out. Fortunately, if the account is not quite as inclusive as it might be, it remains true that the account includes many important elements, and the inclusion of some other element of the same sort will not make any difference to our conclusion.
- 17 For convenience, let "choosing to do A" be a success term – that Jane can choose to lie only if, given that she so chooses, she lies.
- 18 Compatibilists sometimes suggest that actions out of character are unfree, though this would make most heroic action unfree. There are other possible fine-tunings, but by now the general compatibilist strategy should be clear.
- 19 Strictly, (HP*) reiterates what (CFa) and (CFb) stated earlier, putting the point in another way.
- 20 Of course further refinements are possible; for example, perhaps in the last sentence one should think of "A" as replaceable only by terms describing basic actions (roughly, actions performable without performing other actions in order to perform them). But this formulation seems sufficient for present purposes.
- 21 Assumptions made "for the sake of the argument" can be replaced by other assumptions (e.g., that persons are fully immaterial, or fully material; that causes are simultaneous with, or are both precedent to and simultaneous with, their effects) without affecting the force of the argument; the argument's success as a proof does not require their being true as opposed to some alternative. Thus the premises so assumed could be avoided by using complex disjunctive premises; the cumbersomeness of that procedure motivates the use of "for the sake of the argument" assumptions.
- 22 Again, there are behavior-relevant states besides intentions, but here let "intentions" represent the entire range of states that are behavior-representing and behavior-relevant. I will not worry here about sorting out "intention-as-representational" and "intentional-as-end-seeking" as this is not crucial to the argument.
- 23 By "entire set of causes" is meant "the set of phenomena that, given background condition, is sufficient to yield the effect in question," leaving aside the difficult question as to how to mark off background conditions from causes. The argument is compatible with a wide variety of ways of making this distinction.

- 24 Obviously, there are other scenarios that involve mixed internal-and-external causes; some of these will come up for consideration shortly.
- 25 A Libertarian can hold the same thing regarding Jon's simply smiling – that this is a basic action that Jon can be categorically free in performing. The slightly more complicated case (decision to smile, then smiling) is helpful in bringing out the details of a deterministic perspective.
- 26 By determinism's being true, I mean that for any time T at which there is a created universe, determinism is true regarding the universe at that time.
- 27 Strictly, perhaps God can cause things that God did not intend to cause (for their own sake) but which simply follow from what God does intend to cause for its own sake; God might intentionally cause a yellow cab to exist and thereby cause there to exist tires with a certain size even though God did not care that the cab's tires were that particular size as opposed to various other sizes they might have been. God might decide to produce the tires by some random process that might equally well produce tires of any of hundreds of slightly different sizes. Still, God will not have caused something to exist without knowing it.
- 28 Arguably, Mary no longer thinks or acts; Ann thinks or acts "in Mary" as well as "in Ann." But we need not get into that here.
- 29 The temptation to think so arises from noting that if S lives in a deterministic world, then what S does is both non-probabilistically predictable and unfree, so if what S does is free then it is probabilistically predictable. But the reasoning is fallacious. It is exactly parallel to this. Consider a world in which this is a law: S eats chocolate at time T if and only if S eats peanut butter at time T. Let this be a Reese's World (RW). If S lives in a Reese's World, and S eats peanut butter at T then S eats chocolate at T. Suppose that S moves from a Reese's World to a non-Reese's World (one where it is not a law that one eats peanut butter at a time if and only if one also eats chocolate at that time). Then S can eat chocolate without also eating peanut butter (and conversely). What temptation there was to deny this would go as follows. Let the law whose presence makes a world be a Reese's World be LCPB. Let eating chocolate at T be CT and eating peanut butter at T be PBT. Then the reasoning would be: since when LCPB holds, every CT is also a PBT, every CT is a PBT whether LCPB holds or not. But of course this is fallacious. Having moved, S can now eat her chocolate by itself.
- 30 This claim should be distinguished from the false claim that A proposition that says that X will obtain at T can be true even if A does not obtain at T.

15 Faith and reason

- 1 Curiously, officially taking this stance regarding religion and morality does not prevent those who do so from treating at least certain of their own moral concerns as proper bases for law or from being sure that, if there is a God, then God will either approve of their lifestyle or at least be decent enough to suspend judgment.
- 2 "Contingent" here just means "non-necessary." It does not have the meaning of "dependent for existence on," which is another meaning of the word.
- 3 Philosophers often call such beliefs in corrigible; one cannot go wrong in having them.
- 4 If the ontological argument has a true conclusion, then God exists is a necessary truth. So Anselmians will disagree with the claim that no religious beliefs are unbreakable. This will be something to worry about if and when we have a sound and valid ontological argument that extends our knowledge.

- 5 Exactly what else besides true belief is required for knowledge is highly controversial. Roughly, one party to the contemporary disputes requires only that the beliefs have been formed in the right way (with different accounts of what that is). Their opponents require that the believer be in possession of the right sort of recognized evidence (with different accounts of what that is). It will not be necessary for us to decide that matter here.
- 6 Indeed, it is logically impossible that delicate knowledge be a variety of unbreakable knowledge. For any person S and proposition P, if P is a necessary truth or it is true that S believes that P entails P is true, then it is necessarily true that P is a necessary truth or that S believes that P entails P is true. Unbreakable knowledge consists in comprehending belief that necessarily true or belief-entailed truths are true. Kim's holding a delicate belief is a matter of Kim's accepting a proposition that is not a necessary truth and is not such that her accepting it entails its being true. Kim's having delicate knowledge is a matter of her accepting a true proposition of the indicated sort. So for any person S and proposition P, it is logically impossible that P be the object of both S's unbreakable and S's delicate belief or knowledge.
- 7 One reason for this is that Kim needs salvation entails Kim exists and that proposition is not a necessary truth. That Kim exists is a belief-entailed proposition relative to Kim if Kim believes it, but its truth does not entail that Kim needs salvation.
- 8 This idea is often thought of as part of Reformed Epistemology. It is an essential plank in that program, but it is also a perfectly detachable plank that was known long before, and independent of, any commitment to Reformed Epistemology.
- 9 Truth-functional.
- 10 Consider two scenarios. One: a universe U1 exists in which there are a trillion distinct numbered places, one item X that fills exactly one place, and it is not in place 407; if Rita believes that X is in place 500, the fact that X is not in place 407 increases the odds in favor of one's belief – the chances of Rita's belief being true is, not one in a trillion, but one is a trillion-minus-one. Two: a universe U2 exists in which there are three places, one item Y that fills exactly one place, and it is not in place 3; if Rita believes that Y is in place 1, the fact that Y is not in place 3 increases the odds that Rita's belief is true – rather than the chances of her belief being true being 1 in 3, it is now 1 in 2. This much is common ground between our disputants. The confirmationist, who likely will begin with Two, claims that Y not being in place 3 is evidence that Y is in place 1 – and equally evidence that Y is in place 2. The falsificationist denies this. The confirmationist, of course, is also in all consistency committed to holding that X's not being in place 407 is evidence that it is in place 500, although it is also equally evidence that it is in place 1, place 2, and so on for a trillion places minus two (since 407 and 500 are already mentioned). The falsificationist, who likely will begin with One, denies that X's not being in 500 is any evidence whatever for X's being in place 407; she also denies that it is evidence that X is in any of the other places in U1. (Strictly, it is not X's not being in place 407 or Y's not being in place 3 that is evidence, but knowledge that these things obtain.) The confirmationist assumes, and the falsificationist denies, that A increases the probability of P's truth entails A is evidence for P's truth. This is a nice example of what Everett Hall, in his genuinely brilliant but neglected Philosophical Systems (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960) calls a categorical dispute.
- 11 One could make the notion of competing theories less restrictive, allowing competition to include cases of only partially overlapping data explained, and in other ways. But doing so is not necessary to the argument here.

- 12 Reflect on All our beliefs are culturally determined (and so not valid beyond our culture) which, if true, is true of all beliefs in all cultures but held in his, and so false. Many seem to believe that One ought to believe nothing but what science teaches, but that claim is not something that science teaches, so they are inconsistent in believing it. Only what passes the Verification Principle of the Logical Positivists is meaningful did not pass the test of the Verification Principle. It is true that No view that commits intellectual suicide can be known to be true.
- 13 Some would add here that these beliefs regarding the data and the theory and potential theories not involve culpable ignorance; this seems correct.
- 14 It may be that even if one's evidence is that torture for pleasure is now obligatory, perhaps it would be morally wrong to accept that belief. It may be that one's beliefs are typically not under one's control and that one can bring them under such control only by a rational examination of their grounds. It may be that some beliefs, even when one tends to believe them false, can only be eradicated by engaging in certain practices. An ethic of belief would have to weave these considerations, along with many others, into an overall coherent theory offered with reasons for thinking the theory true. I offer no such thing here.

Bibliography

- Alston, William (1967) "Problems of philosophy of religion," Encyclopedia of Philosophy, New York: Macmillan, vol. 6.
- Alston, William (1991) Perceiving God, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Bascom, John (1880) Natural Theology, New York: G. Putnam's Sons.
- Basham, A.L. (1951) History and Doctrine of the Ajivikas, London: Luzac Press.
- Basham, A.L. (1954) The Wonder That Was India, New York: The Macmillan Company.
- Bertocci, Peter (1951) An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall.
- Bowker, John (1973) The Sense Of God, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bowker, John (1978) The Religious Imagination and the Sense of God, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Braddon-Mitchell, David and Jackson, Frank (eds) (1996) Philosophy of Mind and Cognition, Oxford: Blackwell.
- Brightman, E.S. (1940) A Philosophy of Religion, New York: Prentice-Hall.
- Broad, C.D (1953) Religion, Philosophy, and Psychical Research, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Burrell, Donald (ed.) (1967) Cosmological Arguments, Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.
- Burt, E.A. (1951) Types of Religious Philosophy, New York: Harper and Brothers.
- Carpenter, Estlin J. (1977) Theism in Medieval India, New Delhi: Oriental Books Reprint Corporation.
- Carr, Brian and Mahalingham, Indira (1996) Companion Encyclopedia of Asian Philosophy, London: Routledge.
- Chatterjee, Satishchandra and Datta, Dhirendramohan (1950) An Introduction to Indian Philosophy, Calcutta: University of Calcutta Press.
- Chisholm, Roderick (1976) Person and Object, La Salle, IL: Open Court.
- Christian, William (1972) Opposition of Religious Doctrines, New York: Herder and Herder.
- Cohn-Sherbok, Daniel (1996) Medieval Jewish Philosophy, Surrey: Curzon.
- Collins, James (1967) The Emergence of the Philosophy of Religion, New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Cornman, James W. and Lehrer, Keith (1974) Philosophical Problems and Arguments: An Introduction, New York: Macmillan.
- Davidson, Herbert (1987) Proofs for Eternity, Creation, and the Existence of God in Medieval Islamic and Jewish Philosophy, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Davidson, Herbert (1992) Alfarabi Avicenna and Averroes on Intellect, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- D'Costa, Gavin (1980) Theology and Religious Pluralism, Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
- Donagan, Alan (1977) Theory of Morality, Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

- Donagan, Alan (1987) Choice: The Essential Element in Human Action, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Flew, Anthony (1966) God and Philosophy, London: Hutchinson.
- Frank, Daniel H. and Leaman, Oliver (1997) History of Jewish Philosophy, London: Routledge.
- Franks Davis, Caroline (1989) The Evidential Force of Religious Experience, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Frankfurt, H.G (1988) The Importance of What We Care About, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Griffiths, Paul (1983) "Notes toward a critique of Buddhist Karmic theory," Religious Studies, Vol. 18, No. 3, pp. 277–91.
- Grittiths, Paul J. (1991) An Apology for Apologetics, Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Haldane, E.S.H. and Ross, G.R.T. (eds) The Philosophical Works of Descartes, London: Dover Publications.
- Haldane, J.J. and Smart, J.J.C. (1996) Theism and Atheism, Oxford: Blackwell.
- Hall, Everett (1958) Philosophical Systems, Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hall, Everett (1960) Philosophical Systems: A Categorical Analysis, Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hardy, Alister (1979) The Spiritual Nature of Man: A Study of Contemporary Religious Experience, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Henninger, Mark (1989) Relations: Medieval Theories, 1250–1325, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Herman, Arthur (1976) The Problem of Evil in Indian Thought, Delhi: Motilal Barnasidass.
- Hewitt, Harold (1991) Problems in the Philosophy of Religion, New York: St Martin's Press.
- Hick, John (1980) God Has Many Names, London: Macmillan.
- Hick, John (1989) An Interpretation of Religion, London: Macmillan and New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Hick, John (1995) A Christian Theology of Religions, Louisville, PA: Westminster / John Knox Press.
- Hick, John and McGill, Arthur (eds) The Many-faced Argument, New York: Macmillan.
- Hoffman, Joshua and Rosenkrantz, Gary S. (1994) Substance Among Other Categories, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hoffman, Joshua and Rosenkrantz, Gary S. (1997) Substance: Its Nature and Existence, London: Routledge.
- Honderich, T. (1993) How Free Are You?, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hume, David (1737) A Treatise Of Human Nature, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978.
- Jacobi, Herman (trans.) (1962) Jaina Sutras, New York: Dover Publications, originally published in 1896.
- Jaini, P. (1979) The Jaina Path of Perfection, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
- Kellner, Menachem (1986) Dogma in Medieval Jewish Thought, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kroner, Richard (1956) Speculation in Pre-Christian Philosophy, Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Kroner, Richard (1959) Speculation and Revelation in the Age of Christian Philosophy, Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Kroner, Richard (1961) Speculation and Revelation in Modern Philosophy, Philadelphia: Westminster Press.

- Larsen, Gerald James and Deutsch, Elliot (eds) (1988) Interpreting Across Boundaries, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Leaman, Oliver (1985) An Introduction to Medieval Islamic Philosophy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Leaman, Oliver (1995) Evil and Suffering in Jewish Philosophy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lewis, H.D. (1967) "History of the philosophy of religion," Encyclopedia of Philosophy, New York: Macmillan, vol. 6.
- Lipner, Julius (1986) The Face of Truth, Albany, NY: SUNY Press.
- Locke, John (1990) An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, ed. Peter H. Nidditch and G.A.J. Rogers, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Lott, Eric (1976) God and the Universe in the Vedantic Theology of Ramanuja, Madras: Ramanuja Research Society.
- Lott, Eric (1980) Vedantic Approaches to God, London: Macmillan.
- Loux, Michael (1997) Metaphysics, London: Routledge.
- Lowe, E.J. (1989) Other Kinds of Being, Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
- Lowe, E.J. (1996) Subjects of Experience, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- McGrath, Alister (1994) Christian Theology, Oxford: Blackwell.
- McGrath, Alister E. (1998) Historical Theology, Oxford: Blackwell.
- Macintosh, H.R. (1940) The Problem of Religious Knowledge, New York: Harper and Brothers.
- Mackie, J.L. (1982) The Miracle of Theism, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Matin, C.B. (1989) Religious Experience, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Mavrodes, George (1970a) Belief in God: A Study in the Epistemology of Religion, New York: Random House.
- Mavrodes, George (ed.) (1970b) The Rationality of Belief in God, Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall.
- Mitchell, Basil (1981) The Justification of Religious Belief, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Molina, L. (1988) On Divine Foreknowledge, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Mookerji, Satkari (1944) The Jaina Philosophy of Non-Absolutism, Calcutta: Bharati Mahavidyalaya.
- Moore, A.W. (1991) The Infinite, London: Routledge.
- Murty, Satchidananda K. (1974) Reason and Revelation in Advaita Vedanta, Delhi: Motilal Barnasidass.
- Nasr, S.H. and Leaman, Oliver (1996) History of Islamic Philosophy, London: Routledge.
- Ormsby, Eric (1984) Theodicy in Islamic Thought, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Pap, Arthur (1959) Semantics and Necessary Truth, New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Parfit, Derek (1984) Reasons and Persons, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Patterson, Robert Leet (1970) The Philosophy of Religion, Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Penelhum, Terence (1983) God and Scepticism, Dordrecht: D. Reidel.
- Perrett, Roy (ed.) (1989) Indian Philosophy of Religion, Dordrecht: Kluwer Academic Publishers.
- Phillips, Steven, (1995) Classical Indian Metaphysics, La Salle, IL: Open Court.
- Pike, Nelson (ed.) (1992) Mystic Union: An Essay on the Phenomenology of Mysticism, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Plantinga, Alvin (1974a) The Nature of Necessity, Oxford: Clarendon Press.

- Plantinga, Alvin (1974b) God, Freedom and Evil, New York: Random House.
- Plantinga, Alvin (ed.) (1974c) The Ontological Argument, New York: Harper and Row.
- Quasten, Johannes (1996) Patrology, four volumes, Allen, TX: Christian Classics Reprint.
- Radhakrishnan, Sarvapalli and Moore, C.A. (eds) (1957) A Sourcebook in Indian Philosophy, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Ramanuja (1980) Sacred Books of the East, ed. Max Mueller, Delhi: Motilal Barnadisass.
- Rambachan, Anantanand (1991) Accomplishing the Accomplished: The Vedas as a Source of Valid Knowledge in Sankara, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Reichenback, Bruce (1990) The Law of Karma, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Rowe, William (1975) The Cosmological Argument, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Rowe, William (1982) "Religious experience and the principle of credulity," International Journal for the Philosophy of Religion, Vol. 13, pp. 85–92.
- Rowe, William L. (1991) Thomas Reid on Freedom and Morality, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Schmidt, William (1931) The Origin and Growth Of Religion, London: Methuen and Company.
- Sharma, Arvind (1993) God, Truth and Reality, New York: St Martin's Press.
- Smart, Ninian (1960) A Dialogue of Religions, London: SCM Press.
- Smart, Ninian (1964a) Doctrine and Argument in Indian Philosophy, London: Allen and Unwin.
- Smart, Ninian (1964b) Philosophers and Religious Truth, London: SCM Press.
- Smart, Ninian (1973) The Science of Religion and the Sociology of Knowledge, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Smith, Wilfred Cantwell (1979) Faith and Belief, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Smith, Wilfred Cantwell (1981) Towards a World Theology, Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Sopa, Geshe and Jones, Elving A Light to the Svatantrika-Madhyanika, privately circulated.
- Subba Rao, S. (1904) Vedanta Sutras, Madras, first published by Williams and Norgate, London (1921).
- Swinburne, Richard (1979) The Existence of God, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Swinburne, Richard (1981) Faith and Reason, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Thibaut George (trans.) (1962a) The Vedanta Sutras of Badarayana with the Commentary of Sankara, New York: Dover Publications, originally published in 1896.
- Thibaut, George (trans.) (1962b) The Vedanta Sutras with the Commentary by Ramanuja, Delhi: Motilal Barnasidass reprint, originally published by Oxford University Press (1904).
- Thomas, George F. (1970) Philosophy and Religions Belief, New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
- Thomas, George F. (1973) Religious Philosophies of the West, New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.
- Thompson, Samuel (1955) A Modern Philosophy of Religion, Chicago: Henry Regnery.
- Van Inwagen, Peter (1983) An Essay on Free Will, Oxford: Clarendon Press.

- Wainwright, William J. (1984) "Wilfred Cantwell Smith on faith and belief," Religious Studies, Vol. 20, pp. 353–66.
- Warder, A.K. (1990) A History of Indian Buddhism, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Warren, H.C. (1959) Buddhist Scriptures, Baltimore: Penguin Books.
- Warren, H.C. (1969) Buddhism in Translations, New York: Atheneum Press.
- Watson, G. (ed.) (1982) Free Will, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Watt, W. Montgomery (1973) The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Wiemsn, H.N. and Meland, Bernand Eugene (eds) (1936) American Philosophies of Religion, Chicago, IL: Willett, Clark, and Co.
- Wood, Thomas (1990) The Mandukya Upanishad and the Agama Sastra: An Investigation into the Meaning of the Vedanta, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Wood, Thomas (1991) Mind-Only, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1968a) "Empiricism and theism," Sophia, Vol. 7, No. 3, October, pp. 3–11.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1968b) "A reply to Nielsen," Sophia, Vol. 7, No. 3, October, pp. 18, 19.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1971) Basic Issues in the Philosophy of Religion, Boston: Allyn and Bacon.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1986a) "Some varieties of relativism," International Journal for Philosophy of Religion, Vol. 19, pp. 61–85.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1986b) Christianity and Philosophy, Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1990) Hume's "Inexplicable Mystery", Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1993) "Some varieties of religious pluralism," in James Kellenberger (ed.), Inter-religious Models and Criteria, New York: St Martin's Press.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1995a) The Epistemology of Religious Experience, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1995b) "A defense of dualism," Faith and Philosophy, Vol. 12, No. 4, October, pp. 548–66.
- Yandell, Keith E. (1989) "Divine existence and gratuitous evil," Religious Studies, Vol. 25, pp. 15–30.
- Zagzebski, Linda (1991) The Dilemma of Freedom and Foreknowledge, New York: Oxford University Press.

Index

- Abraham 89
Absolutism 101, 104 action 115; vs nonaction 316–17 actuality 187–8
Actually Pointless Evil Claim 143–7,
150; and religious maturity 147–50
Advaita 282; appeal to enlightenment
experience 285–6
Advaita Vedanta (Unqualified Non-Dualism) 4, 5, 6, 24, 54, 59, 60, 101, 103, 104, 241, 242, 267, 268, 304, 361; causal theory of perception account 106–7; described 29–30, 32– 3; and enlightenment experience
272–6; interpretation of 28–9; reductionism/eliminativism 107–9;
and reincarnation/karma 26; two theories account 105–6; and ultimate reality 101, 102–9
Anguttara NikayaV, text from 43 animals: and disappearance of species 154–60; inefficiency issues 153–4;
suffering of 138–43
annihilators see copiers and annihilators
Anselm, St 174 appeals: to argument 241–2; to experience 241–2, 267, 297; to experiential evidence 267–8 appearance 28, 29, 30
Aquinas, St Thomas: arguments 184–8;
Fifth Way 204–8; First Way 188–91;
general structure of arguments 185;
Second Way 191–2; Third Way 192– 4 argument 361; against compatibilism
310–11; against mind–body dualism 261–3; from evil 123; offered within religious traditions xv; strategies
181–2
Argument from Design 204–8
Aristotle xv, 192 artifacts 204–6 atheism 93–4
Atman Theory (AT) 106, 107–8
Augustine, St 182 belief-entailment 348–9
Bhavadgita 47
Bible, texts from 41–2
Brahman 4, 6, 29–30, 32, 47, 55, 60, 102, 103–5, 107, 241, 272
Brahman Theory 106
Bṛhadaranyaka Upanishad III, text from 46
Buddhism 24, 31–2, 53–4, 101, 109, 111–16, 241, 267, 282, 335; appeals to experience 286–7; change and impermanence 5, 6, 113; and Complexity View 257; philosophical context 242–3; property vs substance dualism 243–4; and reincarnation/karma 112; and simplicity 113–14; view of persons 114–16, 247–8; see also Theravada
Buddhism
bundle theory 361; external critique of 248–9; internal critique 249–52;
Jainism, Buddhism and justice requirement 247–8; nonsubstantialist view of persons 246–7 bundle-of-momentary states view 295– 7 categorical freedom 309–10 categories 13
causal impossibility 316
causal likeness principle 262
Chandogya Upanishad VI, text from 45–6

- change 5, 6, 113, 187, 188–9, 192
 Christianity 4, 24–5, 32, 54, 59–60, 148, 361 chronological cause 185–6 cloud chamber 48 cognitive vs affective state 48
 Common Reasoning 138–43 common sense beliefs 3 compatibilism 309–10, 315, 361; actions vs nonactions 316–17; argument against 310–11; constraints 318; freedom 317–18, 321; negative story 319–21; positive story 318–19
 Complexity View of persons 246–52; critiques against 248–59; different results problem 255–6; logical impossibility problem 256; perfect resemblance mistake 256–7; relevance to Jainism and Buddhism 257; on there being a fact of the matter 257–9 concurrent cause 185–6 conditionals 95
 confirmationism 352–3 consistency strategy 361; problems with 129–31; straightforward inconsistency 128–9 contingency 348–9
 Control Principle 312–15, 321
 copiers and annihilators 252–5, 252–9; different results problem 255–6
 Cornman, J.W. 260, 263
 Cosmological Argument 195, 203–4, 361; claims concerning 202–3; stage one 196; stage two 196–8; stage three 198–200; stage four 200–2 creation in time view 182 Creator–creature distinction 59–60 cultural beliefs 3
- de re/de dicto* necessities 172–4
 Descartes, René 174, 287–9, 296 descriptions, of enlightenment experience 272–3 determinism 361; based on logical necessity 306–8; and Control Principle 312–15; and explanation 311–12; monotheistic 333–5; not based on logical necessity 308 diagnosis 361
Digha Nikaya II, text from 42 disappearance of species see animals diversity 61–3 divine foreknowledge 335; comments on argument 336; now not to understand 336–7 doctrine 361; agreement on importance of 53–6; diversity in 61–3; metaphysical 59–60; moral 60–1 domains 186–7 dualism 242, 361; arguments against 262–3; Jain 259–61 duration 287
 Dvaita (Unqualified Dualism) 101, 104
- ecology, and evil 152–60 eliminative materialism 263 eliminativism 107–9 empirical possibility 222–3 enduring-mental-substance view 295–7 enlightenment 30–1, 48, 54, 56, 111, 115, 361 enlightenment experience: Advaita appeal to 285–6; appeals to of 267; Buddhist-type appeals to 293–5; contrast of arguments 295–7; descriptions of 272–3; and experimental evidence 268–70; experts in 270; Jain-type appeals to 286–93; as qualityless, indestructible, momentary 268–9, 272, 273–5, 279–85 entails 361 epistemology 17 essences 96, 361 ethical theory 361 ethics 17, 362
 evangelism 69
 everlasting world strategy 181, 183 evidence: being vs providing 228–30; experience as direct 216–18; from religious experience 230–1 evil 5–6, 124, 362; actually (or metaphysically) pointless 143–7, 150, 162; and consistency issue 128–31; divinely unjustifiable 161; and ecology 152–60; evidential issue 131–8; and existence of God 125–6, 127–8; and Greek monotheism 87, 88; imaginably but not contextually pointful argument 135–6; inexplicable 162; and moral

- acceptability 150–1; problem of 125; Rowean argument 161–4; simple argument 132–3; sophisticated argument 133–5; unimaginably painful argument 135, 136–7
- existence: according to Aquinas 194–5; because of God 89–90; explanation of 88; logically necessary 200–2
- experience: conceptual 226; direct/indirect distinction 217–18; explaining away 225–6; as if 219–23; ineffable 224–5; kind of 221–2; logically consumed 222; necessary qualifications 223–4; reliability of 218–19; religious 227; sensory/religious distinction 226–7; subject/content 277–82; what sort 216–17
- experiential evidence: against God’s existence 233–4; appeals to 267–8; application of principle 231–4; compromised 220, 232; confuted 221, 232; contradicted 220–1, 232; counterbalancing 219–20; direct 216–18; logically or in fact consumed 222–3, 232; principle of 218–27; principles 276–82
- explanation 311–12
- explanatory power 356–8
- extrinsic worth 154–5
- faith 7, 343, 362
- false claims xiii, 56
- falsificationism 353; ways of being falsified 355–6
- fatalism 306–8
- Fifth Way argument 204–8
- fire-fearers vs water-fearers 56
- First Way argument 188–91
- foreknowledge 362
- formal logical necessity 362
- freedom 7, 317–18, 322, 336–7; constraints 318
- future tense truths 337–8
- generalizations 96
- God 54, 55, 59, 362; and Actually Pointless Evil Claim 143–50; and consistency issue 128–31; dependence on 86–7; as divine 47; evidential issue 131–8; and existence of evil 125–6, 127–8; existence of 6, 174–6, 177–81, 184, 233–4; as finite 126; imaginably but not contextually painful argument 135–6; as independent 101; as ineffable 224–5; as infinite 29–30; monotheistic views 5, 6, 7, 85–96; moral goodness of 304–5; ontological argument 175–7, 178–80; power of 126–7; purely conceptual proof of 174; questions concerning 3; simple argument 132–3; sophisticated argument 133–5; strong/weak providence 85; unimaginably painful argument 135, 136–7
- Gospels 25
- Gotama Buddha 48
- hedonitic content 40
- highest being 85
- Hinayana (Small Vehicle) see Theravada Buddhism
- Hinduism 4, 24, 26, 27, 90–1
- human concepts 70–1
- Hume, David 207, 293–4,
- idealism 242, 362
- identity 31; common themes 58–61; content/function 57–8; high standards for 58; low standards for 57–8; numerical vs qualitative 244–5; personal 246; symmetry/transitivity of 244; as transitive 226
- ignorance 30, 33
- impermanence 5
- in fact inevitability 315
- inclusive strategy 182, 183
- inductive argument 207
- inefficiency issues 153–4
- infinite series 190–1
- informal logical necessity 362
- interactionism 362
- intrinsic worth 154–5; exchangeable 158–60; unexchangeable 158, 160–1
- introspection 278–80, 289–93, 296–7
- invalid argument 362
- irreflexive relations 184–5, 186, 187
- Islam 4, 362
- Jaina Sutras* 43–5, 53, 54

- Jainism 4, 5, 24, 26, 54, 60, 241, 267, 268, 282, 335, 362; appeals to experience 286–7, 289–90; arguments for dualism 260–1; and change 113; and Complexity View 257; described 30–1, 32; dualism 259–60; endurance and self-conscious 6; and enlightenment experience 272–6; and persons 114–16; philosophical context 242–3; property vs substance dualism 243–4; and reincarnation/karma 112; and simplicity 113–14; and ultimate reality 101, 109–11, 112–16; view of persons 247
- Judaism 4, 25, 89, 148, 362
- justice requirement 112, 247–8
- karma 26–8, 45, 112, 124, 252
karma 362
kevala (enlightenment) 30–1, 44, 53, 54, 56, 268, 269, 284, 290
- knowledge 343–4, 346
- laws of nature 95–6
- Lehrer, K. 260, 263
- levels of being 28–9
- levels of truth 28, 29
- Libertarianism 309–10, 362
- Locke, John 106–7, 295–6
- logic 70–4, 78
- logical contingency 195, 197–9, 202–3, 362
- logical inevitability 315
- logical necessity 171–4, 180–1, 200–2, 306–8, 362; objections to 174–5
- logically impossible 198, 201, 362
- logically possible 195–8, 200–2, 362
- Madhva 29, 101, 105
- Mahavira 30–1, 43, 44, 48, 111
- Mahayana Buddhism 335
- Mahayana (Great Vehicle) 24, 101, 115
- mapping problem 262–3
- materialism 242, 362
- Mavrodes, George 169–70
- maximal greatness/excellence 176–7
- maximally indeterminate beings 75–7
- memory 115–16
- metaphysical necessity 362
- metaphysics 17, 59–60
- mind and body 242, 259–61
- modal proposition 93, 363
- moksha* 30, 54, 56, 60, 268, 269, 284, 297
- monotheism 5, 363; arguments for 6–7; Christian 24–5; distinguishing 91–3; explanatory power 356–8; generic philosophical 85; Greek 86–9; Hindu 90–1, 126, 184; kinds of 93–4; and non-ultimate reality 94–6; reincarnation and karma 26–8; Semitic 89–90, 126, 184; theistic argument 356–8; transition 26
- monotheism (arguments against):
- Actually Pointless Evil Claim 150;
 - and animal suffering 138–37;
 - consistency issue 128–31; evidential issue 131–8; evil and ecology 152–8; evil/moral acceptability 150–1; exchangeable intrinsic natural worth 158–60; failed escapes 126–7; finite deity/evil 127–8; God/evil existence 125–6; and problem of evil 125; reincarnation, karma, evil 123–4; and religious maturity 147–50; succinct Roweanism 151–2; three questions 123; unexchangeable natural intrinsic worth 160–1
- monotheism (arguments for):
- by Aquinas 184–208; empirical proofs 181; logical necessity 171–4; ontological argument 174–7, 179–81; proof 169–71; purely conceptual proof 174; strategies 181–2; Sufficient Reason 182, 183–4; types of propositions 171; X argument 177; Y argument 178; Z argument 178
- moral realism 39
- moral responsibility 322–30
- moral values 363; monotheistic traditions 304–5; nonmonotheistic traditions 303–4
- morality 7, 60–1, 363
- natural laws 222
- natural objects 95, 205–6, 208
- natural value 363
- necessarily true 363
- necessary ontological independence 85
- necessity 347–8

- Neo-Platonism 91
nirguna 102
nirvana 32, 42, 43, 44, 48, 56, 60, 101, 111, 268–9, 284, 290
 NN principle 93
 non-composite endurers/non-endurers 249–52
 non-reciprocal dependence 187, 189–90 non-ultimate reality 94–6 numerical identity 363
- objectivity 15
 Ontological Argument 174, 175–6,
 179–80, 363; analogous arguments
 177–8; exposition of 180; summary of 178–9; without notion of perfection 176–7
 ontological independence 363 operational functional being 204–5, 206–7
 orderliness 207
 Otto, Rudolph 59
- perception, causal theory of 106–7 perfection 176–7
 permanence 292 person 363; Buddhist view of 247–52; claims concerning 241; Complexity View of 246–59; consistency in argument 251–2; external critique of bundle theory 248–9; importance of accounts concerning 114–15;
 internal critique of bundle theory
 249–51; Jain view of 247, 248, 249;
 Jain/Buddhist difference concerning 114, 116; non-substantival view of 246–7; as temporally scattered 113–
 14 personal identity: exhaustive/exclusive disjunction 246; general criteria 246 phenomenal reality 68–9 phenomenological description 215–16, 363 phenomenological difference 40 phenomenologies, and claims 274–6 philosophy: claims and assessment of 7; defined 13; of science 351–2; task of 3–4
 Plantinga, Alvin 174
 Plato 281, 282 pleasure 25
 possibility 315–16
 potentiality 187–8
 Principle of Alternative Possibilities 322, 338–9; acting not a matter of causing actions 328–30; alleged counterexamples 322–3;
 compatibilist response 324–5;
 counterexamples 331–3;
 incompatibilist response 325–8;
 reply to objections 323–4
 probability 348–9
 problem of evil 363 proof 169–71, 224; empirical 181; purely conceptual 174 proper ultimate reason 209 properties 71–2; causal 78; happy 72–3;
 as maximally indeterminate 75–7 property dualism 243–4, 263 property universalism 74–5 propositions 346, 363; logically contingent 195, 197, 198–9; modal 93; types of 171
 Pure Land Buddhism 101
- qualitative identity 363
 qualityless Brahman see Brahman
- Ramanuja 29, 101, 105, 184, 205–7, 290–3, 296
 rationality 358
 Real, the: human concepts 70–4;
 natures or essences 74–7
 reality 28–9, 30
 reason 7, 363 reductionism 107–9
 reflexive relations 184–5 reincarnation 26–8, 112, 123–4, 252, 363 religion 7; arguments offered within xv; claims and assessment of 13–14; definitions of 16–17; diagnoses and cures 4, 17, 23, 32–4, 54; different sorts of 23–4, 34; as diverse 61–3; functional/pragmatic 16; as identical 57–61; notions of 3; philosophy of 4–5, 7, 17–18; substantial/doctrinal 16; task of 4; tradition in 54–5; and truth-claims 56–7
 religious belief: and blame 358;
 epistemic status of 349–50

- religious experience 226–7, 363; appeals to 267; criteria and their application 46–9; descriptions of 41–6; evidential argument from 230–1; experts in 270; notions of 3; structure/content 39–40
- religious maturity 147–50
- religious pluralism 4, 363; content of 67–8; human concepts 70–1, 70–4; importance of (RPE) to 73–4; Maximally Restrictive 70–1; Mediumly Restrictive 71–2; Minimally Restrictive 72–3; natures/essences 74–7; negative view 78–9; religion–relevant consequences of 68–9
- religious tradition 363
- religious values: monotheistic traditions 304–5; nonmonotheistic traditions 303–4
- restricted property universalism 75
- robust foundationalism 350; religious claims 350–1
- Rowe, William 138–40, 142–3
- Roweanism 161–4; succinct 151–2
- saintliness 148
- salvation 363
- scientism 344–6
- Second Way argument 191–2
- self: as apparent/real 28–30, 32; as enduring/transitory 6, 31–2, 33; as omniscient 30–1, 32
- self-authentication 271–2, 363; descriptions 272–3; evidence about what 273–4; experiential evidence 276–82; particular experiences/universal claims 274; phenomenologies that fit the claims 274–6; re-statement of argument 282–4; subject/content experience 277–82
- self-change 189–90, 195
- self-consciousness 70, 85, 113, 289, 290–2, 296
- semantic logical necessity 363
- Shankara 28–9, 53, 101, 103, 105, 107, 285
- simplicity 113–14
- sin/salvation 32, 56
- Spinoza, Baruch 105, 307
- substance dualism 243–4
- substance theory 363; arguments against dualism 262–3; Jain dualism 259–61
- Sufficient Reason 182, 183, 209; crucial premises 183; differences in conclusions 183–4
- syntactic logical necessity 363
- teleological argument 208–9, 363–4; statement of 209–10
- Terrible Tiger hypothesis 228–30
- Theravada Buddhism 4, 24, 54, 60, 268–9, 294–5, 364; and Complexity View 257; described 31–2, 33; and enlightenment experience 272–6; and reincarnation/karma 26–8; and ultimate reality 101, 109, 111–16
- thick experience 215–16
- thick/thin description 216
- Third Way argument 192–4
- transcendence 85
- truth 337–8, 348–9
- truth values xiii, 171–2
- truth–claims 56–7
- ultimate existence explanation 209
- ultimate reality: non-94–6; nonmonotheistic conceptions of 101–16
- universalism 74–5
- universe-time-together creation view 182
- Upanishadic* texts 103, 104, 105
- valid argument 364
- value by association 154
- Vedas* 104
- Vsistadvaita (Qualified Non–Dualism) 101, 104
- world-has-a-beginning strategy 182, 183
- X argument 177
- Y argument 178
- Z argument 178

THE SOCIOLOGY OF EARLY BUDDHISM

GREG BAILEY AND IAN MABBETT

CAMBRIDGE

CAMBRIDGE

more information - www.cambridge.org/9780521831161

THE SOCIOLOGY OF EARLY BUDDHISM

Early Buddhism flourished because it was able to take up the challenge represented by buoyant economic conditions and the need for cultural uniformity in the newly emergent states in northeastern India from the fifth century BCE onwards. This book begins with the apparent inconsistency of Buddhism, a renunciant movement, surviving within a strong urban environment, and draws out the implications of this. In spite of the Buddhist ascetic imperative, the Buddha and other celebrated monks moved easily through various levels of society and fitted into the urban landscape they inhabited. The Sociology of Early Buddhism tells how and why the early monks were able to exploit the social and political conditions of mid-first millennium northeastern India in such a way as to ensure the growth of Buddhism into a major world religion. Its readership lies both within Buddhist studies and more widely among historians, sociologists and anthropologists of religion.

GREG BAILEY has been teaching Sanskrit, Indian religions and Indian Literature at La Trobe University for the past twenty-four years. He has a PhD in Indian Studies from Melbourne University (1980). In the semester 1998 he was a visiting research fellow at the Seminar for Indian Studies and Comparative Religion at the University of Tübingen. He is a member of the International Consultative Committee of the International Association of Sanskrit Studies and a member of the Board of the Dubvronik International Conference on the Sanskrit Epics and Purāṇas.

IAN MABBETT, Reader in History at Monash University, Melbourne, was Professor of Indian and Buddhist Studies, Aichi Bunkyo University, Nagoya, 2000–2, and has made frequent research trips to India and South-East Asia (including visiting forest monasteries in Thailand). He is author of A Short History of India (1983); co-author (with David Chandler) of The Khmers (1995); and contributor to Jon Ortner (photographer), Angkor: Celestial Temples of the Khmer Empire (2002) and to reference books such as The Cambridge History of Southeast Asia (1992) and Encyclopedia of Asian History (1988).

THE SOCIOLOGY OF EARLY BUDDHISM

GREG BAILEY AND IAN MABBETT

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge, New York, Melbourne, Madrid, Cape Town, Singapore, São Paulo

Cambridge University Press

The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 2RU, United Kingdom

Published in the United States of America by Cambridge University Press, New York

www.cambridge.org

Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9780521831161

© Greg Bailey and Ian Mabbett, 2003

This book is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provision of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published in print format 2003

ISBN-13 978-0-511-06296-4 eBook (NetLibrary)

ISBN-10 0-511-06296-6 eBook (NetLibrary)

ISBN-13 978-0-521-83116-1 hardback

ISBN-10 0-521-83116-4 hardback

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party internet websites referred to in this book, and does not guarantee that any content on such websites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

Contents

Acknowledgements	page vi
List of abbreviations	vii
Introduction	I
1 The problem: asceticism and urban life	13
CONTEXT
2 The social elite	39
3 Economic conditions	56
4 Urbanization, urbanism and the development of large-scale political structures	77
5 Brahmins and other competitors	108
6 Folk religion and cosmology: meeting of two thought worlds	138
MEDIATION
7 The holy man	161
8 Preparation of the monk for the mediatory role. Evidence from the Sutta Nipāta	184
9 The Dhammapada and the images of the bhikkhu	196
10 The mediating role as shown in the Canon	215
11 Exchange	232
Conclusion	257
Bibliography	263
Index	276

Acknowledgements

The authors wish first to acknowledge the important contribution of Peter Masefield, whose assistance during the earlier stages of the research helped enormously with the assessment and ordering of a great mass of Pāli language material.

Responsibility for all that is said in the book rests wholly with the authors, but thanks are due to those who have made comments and offered advice at points during the various stages of the work. Detailed comments on some chapters were made by J. W. de Jong, whose recent death has been a great loss to all who work in the field. Also much appreciated have been the comments of Richard Gombrich, Don Miller, Steven Collins, Geoffrey Samuel, Jim Fitzgerald and Alf Hiltebeitel.

The book has benefited particularly from the very constructive criticisms of the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript. Kevin Taylor, Katharina Brett, Gillian Dadd and Joanne Hill of Cambridge University Press have helped improve the book in a myriad of ways.

We also acknowledge the financial assistance of the Australian Research Council, who provided three years of funding to facilitate the initial research for this book. We would also like to thank La Trobe and Monash Universities for the financial support offered to the two authors during the writing of this book.

Finally, the authors wish to acknowledge the patience and endurance of Jaccy and Kerri whose inspiration is always present.

Abbreviations

A	Aṅguttara Nikāya
Aś	Arthaśāstra
BrhU	Brhadāranyaka Upaniṣad
ChU	Chāṇḍogya Upaniṣad
D	Dīgha Nikāya
Dhp	Dhammapada
Dhs	Dharmasūtra
HR	History of Religions
IJ	Indo-Iranian Journal
J	Jātaka
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JESHO	Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient
JLABS	Journal of the International Association of Buddhist Studies
M	Majjhima Nikāya
Mbh	Mahābhārata
MP	Milinda Pañha
PTS	Pali Text Society
S	Samyutta Nikāya
Sn	Sutta Nipāta
Ud	Udāna
Vin	Vinaya
WZKSA	Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde Südasiens
ZDMG	Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft

Introduction

[If a monk] has utterly destroyed every vestige of worldly contamination, if he is not tied to any source of sustenance, if his territory is freedom, then the passing of such a one is hard to trace, like that of birds in the sky.

The idea of total detachment pervading this verse illustrates concisely the fundamental ambience associated with the early Buddhist quest: detachment, freedom from ties, renunciation of the world, celibacy. As both religious attitude and lifestyle practice, adoption of an attitude of total detachment has done much to define the image of the monk throughout the ages since the beginnings of Buddhism. In the world today, and in several recent centuries for which good evidence is available, there is no doubt that the Order of Buddhist monks has had plenty of interaction with society; in many countries it has necessarily been integrated within the pattern of social, cultural and even political systems. A fundamental dichotomy appears then as the monks who received the earliest Buddhist message were expected to live it as homeless mendicants, severing all ties with society in order to devote themselves fully to the search for enlightenment. The problem faced in this book is to explain how, right from the beginning, Buddhism has from a doctrinal viewpoint required of its Order of monks the practical application of an ethic of renunciation and detachment and yet this very same order has remained a vibrant part of society, culture or politics wherever Buddhism has flourished.

The present study confronts this problem by focusing on the relationships between Buddhism, understood as its teachings and the activities of the Buddhist Order, and its social context in northern India in about the fifth to third centuries BCE, assuming that these were the centuries during which the Pāli Canon took shape, though its formation could have continued for another two hundred years. Attention is given especially to the social dynamic of the growth of Buddhism, a dynamic understood within the terms of the opposition suggested in the first paragraph. Inevitably this dynamic must be tested by the material drawn from textual sources which centre above all on interaction between monks, nuns and the broader society, and the archaeological evidence which somewhat contextualizes this. If used with appropriate sensitivity, the available sources can furnish clues to the actual relationships, in all their permutations, between Buddhists and society when it first began to grow. Even the passing of a bird in the sky leaves some sort of trace, and in principle it should be possible to fashion the instruments to detect it.

Much has already been written over the past two centuries about the interaction of the Buddhist Order with society, as one side of the problem, and the implications of Buddhist teachings for social behaviour, as the other side of the problem. On the basis of this line of scholarship certain adumbrated positions have come to be taken as orthodoxy and have subsequently had a more than determinate influence on what scholars expect to find, or hope to defend, when looking at the broad field of early Buddhism and its larger social and economic context. Two of these positions are interrogated in this book and one of the book's aims is to convince those interested in Buddhism of the need to revise progressively the axioms governing our mode of reading the primary sources.

The first of these positions rests on what is virtually a starting point for the present book, the implication, if not proposition, that Buddhism began substantially as one possible response to the changes occurring in northern India in the two centuries from the sixth century BCE onwards. The classic view is given by Bareaux:

The most recent body of archaeological and philological works concerning the middle basin of the Ganges seems indeed to show that this region, in the course of the fifth century, underwent some very important and progressive changes: the beginning of urbanization; distinct economic development, notably in commerce and in the class of merchants (vaṇij and śreṣṭhin) with their caravans of ox carts; accentuation of political unification. Already in process beforehand and finishing in the following century with the Nanda dynasty, then that of the Mauryas, the latter seems to attain a decisive phase in the period of the Blessed One with the progressive affirmation of Magadha's power. These three kinds of changes – urbanization, economic development and political unification – are also quite probably interlinked.¹

¹ A. Bareaux, 'Le Buddha et les rois', Bulletin De L'École Française D'Extrême-Orient, 80/1 (1993), p. 17. But cf. also G. von Simson, 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund der Entstehung des Buddhismus und seine Bedeutung für die Datierungsfrage,' in H. Bechert (ed.), The Dating of the Historical Buddha (Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, Göttingen, 1991), part I, pp. 90–9; P. Olivelle, The Āśrama System (Oxford University Press, New York, 1993), pp. 55–62. More nuanced is Richard Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism. A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1988), ch. 2.

In our view the archaeological evidence, substantially filled out by textual evidence from the Sutta Piṭaka, is quite clear. Buddhism arose in a period when all these changes identified by Bareau, and assumed by most other scholars, had already occurred. The importance of this qualification – and given the observed differences between periods of great change and relative stability, it is much more significant than it seems – is that our understanding of early Buddhism must be of a religious movement developing within a period of relative prosperity and socio-economic consolidation, and not reacting against a period when change was occurring at breakneck speed. Responses to the latter often take radical forms, whereas survival during a period of slow change should be understood more as accommodation to a particular cultural setting. Buddhist literature reveals very little sign of a consciousness (repressed or otherwise) of a period of dramatic change having been traversed.

The second proposition is ultimately dependent upon the first, since if the situation implied in the first had not occurred, it would be impossible even to countenance the second. There is a view that Buddhism arose because it responded positively to a feeling of profound social malaise that gripped certain sections of the population of North India in the sixth and following centuries BCE. The ascetic tradition represented by Buddhism, the Upaniṣadic sages and the early Jains placed great emphasis on the transitoriness of human existence in any dimension that could be named. It is tempting, if not natural, for scholars to try and read the tone of socio-economic conditions in ancient Indian thought, especially where this is so concentrated chronologically and within a small body of texts, into the empirical conditions of the day. The tone of universal dissatisfaction expressed in the concept of dukkha has often been read back into a kind of social Angst operating somewhere in the psyche of the residents of the Ganges valley and inducing them to take up the renouncer's path; Buddhism represented such a vocation.

To recognize both these problems is to realize the difficulties of reasoning convincingly from two very central doctrines – anicca and dukkha – of Buddhism to socio-economic conditions that may have had a formative role in the Buddha's formulation of both doctrines. We see how insecurely founded is the glib notion that the early canonical texts both embody a teaching that must have appealed to the alienated, the disenfranchised, the dispossessed – whatever percentage of the total population these groups comprised – and also reflect a period of social dislocation occurring when they were composed. Not only are the arguments circular, the archaeological and textual evidence goes against them. The teaching of dukkha need not go with social distress – however this might be defined; the canonical texts might reflect any combination of the alienated, etc., and any or none of the times they reflect may have been characterized by either slow or rapid change. For the most part the changes wrought by urbanization and state formation had already occurred in their most far-reaching manifestations by the time the Buddhist texts took the form in which we know them.

Our desire to question these two assumptions means, of course, that we are required to offer alternative solutions to the main problems taken up in this book concerning the interaction between the Buddhist Order and wider society. Such an enterprise is likely to confront similar problems to those of our scholarly predecessors; the shortage of adequate appropriate evidence is conspicuous among them. It is not just the paucity of evidence that creates difficulties, however. Problems attend the way in which we may use the evidence. Even the concepts and presuppositions we bring with us to embark upon the study, as parts of the framework of thought, are fraught with ambiguity. Not the least of such concepts is that of Buddhism itself. It denotes no ready-made atomic reality: it has always meant many different things to different people. This is especially so for the concept of 'early Buddhism', which has itself provoked debate about what it can mean, even in principle. If this is not enough, it is compounded by the temporal disjunction between our literary sources. The Buddha lived in about the fifth century BCE; the texts upon which we must overwhelmingly depend to study the first few centuries of emergent Buddhism were not written down until late in the first century BCE. By then society had doubtless changed a great deal, and what was written down is all too likely to bear the imprint of a later period, an imprint difficult to remove from the earlier material.

We hope we have succeeded in advancing a coherent and plausible account of Buddhism in its social context by cutting away the clutter of unwarranted assumptions that are often made. We have tried to establish in broad outline what is really probable, and pointed to the often indirect evidence yielded by a close reading of the sources, both literary and archaeological.

This book is divided into two parts, which are interrelated in their treatment of particular aspects of Buddhism and its broader social context. Of these the first sets out our own view of the economic and social context within which the Buddha lived and the subsequent Buddhist Order developed, at least for the first two centuries of its existence. We finish roughly at the beginning of the reign of Aśoka, after which source material becomes more abundant and presents a picture of a more extensive Buddhism than what is likely for the pre-Aśokan period. It is necessary to set out the economic and social context in some detail because the second section of the book focuses on a specific role of the monk that makes full sense only within a particular view of society and economy. Our principal contention throughout the book is that Buddhism expanded and flourished, ultimately to a greater extent than its śramaṇic rivals, because the monk (and perhaps the nun, though there is little evidence for this) was able to function as an instrument of mediation between the forces – political and economic – benefiting from the changes that had taken place prior to, and perhaps during, the life of the Buddha, on the one hand, and those other groups for whom such changes were difficult to digest, on the other hand.

In this book there is scarcely any treatment of North India as it appears in middle and late Vedic literature. Details of the socio-economic conditions of this period are largely absent from the literature, but they would be relevant to this study only to the extent that it would be possible to locate a repressed memory of them (or nostalgia for them) in the consciousness of the early Buddhists. It is not possible to locate such a consciousness. Nevertheless, change there was. Erdosy summarizes it with great brevity:

The emergence of what may be termed simple chiefdoms, datable to c. BC 1000, was the culmination of this process [of the reappearance of stable political structures following the collapse of Harappan urbanism]. They were characterized in material culture by an agricultural economy making limited use of iron, by low population density and by a two-tier settlement hierarchy whose central place coordinated the procurement, processing and distribution of vital raw materials . . .

. . . By contrast, the next three centuries [after 550 BCE] witnessed dramatic growth in population size and agglomeration, the colonization of fertile but forested tracts away from the principal watercourses (facilitated by the introduction of iron into agricultural production) and the re-emergence of long-distance trade, of a monetary economy and – sometime before BC 250 – of writing . . .²

The first section of the book fills in with considerable detail the changes noted in the final paragraph of Erdosy's summary. Here we are concerned especially to define the principal elements of the environment of Buddhism in its early centuries and not so much to trace the process of transformation which had already occurred by the time of the Buddha.

This leads into the second section of the book where we analyse the role of the monk as mediator. Both sections are thematically interrelated. If in the first section one of the sub-texts is the emergence of the Buddhist movement conceived as a response to already changed socio-economic conditions, the second section focuses on how members of the Buddhist Order helped other social groups deal with the on-going changes occurring as a result of the large-scale transformation outlined by Erdosy. As a form of interaction, mediation can take many different forms and operates with a range of goals. But it makes sense only within an environment where communication between certain groups has broken down, where there is a need to incorporate culturally diverse elements beneath a single umbrella and where unavoidable change must be explained.

² G. Erdosy, 'City states of North India and Pakistan at the time of the Buddha', in F. R. Allchin (ed.), The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995), p. 99; cf. p. 107.

The growth of Buddhism up until the time of Aśoka must be understood as the partially opportunistic response to large-scale urbanism, the presence of expanding state-based organizations and the rapid diversification of the economy. How should this be understood? Half the battle is to take a clear look at the way scholarship has so far treated the rise of Buddhism, and in this we observe a paradox.

In the first place, many writings on Buddhism focus on the needs of disadvantaged classes in society and support the view, without rigorous examination of the premises of the argument, that Buddhism appealed because of its message of dukkha, a concept defining a totalistic view of the ultimate incapacity of human existence to produce any possibility of permanent happiness. Social dislocation and alienation, it is argued, had caused distress; people heeded the message that life is dukkha. Working from this assumption Buddhism offered an alternative set of values, which must have been tightly defined to enable them to appear to be conspicuously different from other values with which they may have conflicted. This interpretation, however, leaves too many questions unanswered. Buddhism grew in an age of economic expansion, and although no doubt there were pockets of distress and poverty, there is nothing to suggest that the times and places which saw Buddhism thrive were more afflicted by socio-economic malaise than other times and places.

In the second place, many writings focus on the needs of the dominant classes – economic, political and religious – in society and sustain the view that Buddhism in some way reflected the values of the new rising kingdoms and provided their elites with an appropriate ideology. Some of the arguments here are appealing, except that they all presuppose Buddhism to have been something which, in its origin, it was not. In its origin it was a message for those who wished to forsake society, abandoning everything. It was not a rationale for the ambitions of holders of power and magnates. The gap between the austere ascetic impulse and the needs of expanding urban kingdoms is great indeed.

The two schools of thought contradict each other about the rise of Buddhism in its social context, and once the contradictions are clearly seen, it is easier to focus on the assumptions underlying such contradictions and ultimately to recognize how the Buddhist Order interacted with its social context and what the reciprocal relation of influence and borrowing might have been between Buddhist teachings and this environment. The texts certainly offer no reason for disputing that the earliest form of the Buddhist message was indeed the ascetic mendicant one, however rapidly differing responses to it effectively created new versions of it when it had attracted recruits and lay support. One obvious question arises from this. How could the original ascetic impulse play a positive part in the first place, attracting recruits and the support of a laity who could never practise the stringent eremitic lifestyle of the first monks? Our answer to this forms another sub-text of this book. The dynamics of society at the time are not best understood by analysing the needs of horizontal social classes, the precursors of what might have become castes, even though this approach has usually seemed overwhelmingly appealing. On the contrary, it is our contention that it is better to consider the tensions between groups in different geographical locations in relation to an urban/non-urban configuration of the landscape. When dominant core groups such as urban-based kingdoms were expanding rapidly, they encroached upon outlying communities which did not share any significant elements of culture with them. In this situation, there were clashes of cultures which manifested themselves in varying degrees of severity, and there was also a crisis of identity because of the clashes of culture and the mode of enforcement used by the dominant culture. The people being encroached upon needed to reconceptualize their culture, but they lacked an appropriate vocabulary to do so. It was here, precisely, that the wandering holy man, deliberately shunning society, could play an important role as middleman between the two incommensurable cultures, interpreting each to the other and trusted by both sides.

Initially this process took place as a result of the activities of the expanding states of Kośāla and Magadha when their rulers and bureaucracies sought to institutionalize state rule and were required to deal with a patchwork of existing cultures and social forms. But expansion, though it may continue for some time, is a dynamic condition. Eventually outlying communities become more or less integrated within the ruling values of metropolitan societies: brahmins took on the mediating role, and there was less need for the figure of the wandering holy man. Where there were Buddhist monks, they settled in monasteries and became familiar components in the local scene with priest-like functions. This was probably an inevitable process, reaching some kind of mature development about 250 years after the founding of Buddhism. The texts of the Vinaya, concerned with monastic discipline, are often treated indiscriminately along with the books of the Sutta Piṭaka (narratives embodying the Buddha's preaching) as evidence of early Buddhism. However, it seems better to treat the Vinaya, and this concords with archaeological findings relating to the earliest stūpas and monasteries, as generally representing a later stage of development, when the monks were not typically wandering virtuosi seeking enlightenment but domesticated within society. Even so, the Vinaya does preserve for us some traces of the ways in which these monastic monks could play the mediating role within a narrowly defined locality.

But if the role of the monk as mediator is to be identified as one of the reasons why Buddhism survived amongst countless other śramaṇic groups, what are we to make of the postulated original role of the wandering ascetic, seeking to avoid social entanglements but increasingly drawn in because he was needed as middleman between expanding state and isolated village? That is, the capacity of the monk to act as mediator rests as much on his perceived detachment as it does on his capacity to operate at different levels of society and between various value systems. Can the transformation between social detachment in isolation from society to social detachment in society be detected from the sources as a historical change in the early centuries of Buddhism? The Dhammapada, one of the early books of condensed teachings, is taken as a case-study; an examination of it suggests ways in which it can reflect the different orientations of monks towards their ascetic calling, towards the local folk culture, and towards the political sphere. In addition, we also present our analysis of the Sutta Nipāta, one of the oldest texts of the canon, which lays great stress on the monk as renunciant ascetic being totally detached from all of his surroundings. In the many short texts collected here, the classic conditions for the monk as mediator are laid down.

BUDDHISM AS PROCESS: THREE VERSIONS OF BUDDHISM

If the role of monk as mediator dominates the second part of this book, the first part is mainly taken up with setting the context in which this role makes sense. Thus in some sense this book is about context. Especially it is about the social and economic context defining the fledgling Buddhist movement during the first three or four centuries of its existence. A focus on the context and the social aspects of Buddhism confirms our view that the best way to understand early Buddhism is to see it as a dynamic process dependent upon, and perhaps shaping, the societies in which it develops. Of course, it is necessary to reduce this process to specifics, which we have tried to do by dividing the book into two parts, one dealing with extra-Buddhist social roles, the other with the interaction between monks and society. This produces an impression of Buddhism as being many different things.

To illustrate what we intend by this, let us look at three Buddhisms. It comes all too naturally to think of Buddhism, just one noun, as just one thing, with a consistent character of its own. In reality, of course, any widespread movement must be many things to many people; an ideally complete history of Buddhism would identify a large number of often inconsistent Buddhisms representing the many images it has had for different sorts of people. The present study does two things – it insists upon the validity of multiple different versions of Buddhism in history, and for the purpose of understanding the Dharma's rise it focuses on the ascetic, other-worldly and asocial version as the most likely content of the original message. This can be contrasted with the various social versions according to which it played an active part in the community. Here, to exhibit the main different images of Buddhism both in history and among scholars, we can subdivide the 'social' version into two, roughly corresponding to the 'Great Tradition' and the 'Little Tradition' – political involvement and folk culture. Thus we can describe three Buddhisms.

The first represents (the original 'asocial') Buddhism as an ascetic quest embodied in a form of practice. It is exemplified above all in the Sutta Nipāta. It can be called 'ascetic' because of its rejection of the world, but of course the Buddha, unlike some of his contemporaries, rejected deliberate self-mortification, or extreme asceticism; his is a middle way, espousing calm detachment. In this view monks wander constantly, rejecting all social ties. Their object is to obtain a transcendent vision of the way things really are, abandoning all attachments in every sphere. In the absence of attachment and ignorance, one will cease generating karma, and thereby become enlightened and escape the unending frustration and distress inseparable from worldly existence. The aspirant is seen as being self-centred and dogged, as paradoxical as this might seem in the light of Buddhist doctrine.

The second version emphasizes the public (and frequently political) involvement of the dhamma and the saṅgha. In this view Buddhism becomes a system of teachings accessible to all. It offers a rich array of ethical precepts for the committed laity. Monks may seek salvation directly; laymen may set themselves the more modest goal of accumulating merit, which might help them gain enlightenment in a future life. Merit may be gained by supplying the needs of monks among other things. This is easier to achieve if there are settled permanent communities of monks with which the laity can live in symbiosis. Monks can provide education, give counsel to the laity, and even represent the local community to government. Buddhist teaching on this view is a practical system, one which can influence, if not regulate, the dealings individuals have with each other and rulers with their subjects.

The third approach relates Buddhism to the wide context of folk religion and deliberately leaves out the soteriological concepts and the ethical teachings codified in books. Such high-flown ideas, it is argued, are irrelevant to ordinary Buddhists. Real Buddhism must be sought in concrete manifestations in particular times and places, such as rituals to propitiate spirits, the building of stūpas, healing and divination, and miscellaneous dealings between monks and laity. Such evidences belong to the lifetime of the Buddha only by implication, working from the many passages evincing lay reverence to the person of the Buddha. It is therefore impossible directly to reconstruct original Buddhism (if it ever were a unitary thing) by direct evidence, but the analogy of later historical sources and modern anthropological studies points persuasively to the presence of a religion of immanent spiritual powers tapped by ascetic power or appropriate ritual, a religion also reflected in Hindu literature. Monks acquired powers that could be integrated within folk ritual and belief. It was believed they could acquire super-normal powers, and they taught devotion to the Buddha, whose presence or whose relics generated a field of communicable spiritual strength capable of guarding against harmful spirits. Buddhism was on this reading a source of talismans, amulets and apotropaic magic, and the monks were an elite of experts considered capable of concentrating and manipulating spiritual forces for the benefit of others.³

THE INCOMMENSURABILITY OF DIFFERENT VERSIONS

Each of these interpretations offers a coherent account of a postulated historical reality labelled 'Buddhism'. Each overlaps the others in many details, but each has its own patterned thematic structure and rationale which make it different from the others. All such interpretations treat Buddhism as an integrated, organic whole, working according to a particular logic, not as a name for a collection of disparate phenomena. Thus each of the three interpretations, describing an organic unity, is self-sufficient and has its own logic, not needing in principle to be supplemented by another mode of explanation.

³ Cf. the three levels described by Melford Spiro in Buddhism and Society: a Great Tradition and its Burmese Vicissitudes (Harper and Row, New York, 1970), pp. 11–13: nibbānic, kammic and apotropaic. The present descriptions though are of ways of interpreting Buddhism as a whole, not of elements within a local system. Cf. G. Samuel, Civilized Shamans (Smithsonian Institute Press, Washington and London, 1993), ch. 2.

But it is the words 'in principle' which are crucial here, and this for two reasons. First, there is the problem of how closely the empirical reality of a religious tradition ever fits to its scholarly description and the interpretation of the data producing this description. This, of course, may apply equally to the three interpretations. Secondly, there is an incommensurability in these approaches, and one of the most intriguing puzzles in the quest for an understanding of Buddhism in its early history resides in this incommensurability. Are they equally effective in helping us understand the rise and fortunes of the dhamma in ancient India? The key to understanding may be supplied by just one of the approaches, in which case the aspects of Buddhism addressed by the others must be set aside as marginal, 'theoretical' (and hence too distant from the empirical to be relevant) or corrupted manifestations; alternatively it may be supplied by a combination. In this case the empirical historical relationships must be discovered between aspects of religion seemingly belonging in different worlds of thought.

Given that one can think oneself into only one world at a time, though simultaneously be aware of others, it comes naturally to focus upon the explanatory power of one's single favoured interpretation to the neglect of the others, which are seen as incompatible with the essential hermeneutical thrust of the preferred image. The advocate of the ascetic, esoteric image of Buddhism is likely to regard the public and folk images as errors based upon subsequent misunderstandings of what he/she would identify as the essential message, which can often be found throughout history in ascetic revivals. Again, the protagonist of public Buddhism as a practical philosophy apt to guide individual life and social organization is likely to resist any suggestion that the dhamma was an esoteric message essentially only for the elect, and will be impatient with any account of Buddhism in historical practice that dwells upon the adaptation to rituals, magic or spirit cults. Similarly the advocate of Buddhism as an adaptation to folk culture will dismiss the contents of scriptures, however important they seem to modern scholars, as irrelevant to real life.

Nevertheless, there are good reasons for refusing to adopt just one of these approaches to the exclusion of the others. In this book we have utilized all of them. One good reason for this is that none of the aspects of Buddhism treated can be relegated to a marginal zone (a judgement such as 'theory' or 'superstition') deemed irrelevant to the main currents of the history of Indian Buddhism. The esoteric tradition with its austere dedication to enlightenment was written into the records of the faith, and it has at all times inspired the careers of holy men, hermits or peripatetics. Again, Buddhism as public morality holds the high ground, and its civic role has been written into history in every century. As for Buddhism as an element in folk culture, we very much need to know how the history of 'folk Buddhism' was affected by the patchwork of rituals and cults, governed by belief in immanent forces, that textured the world in which the Buddha lived and in which his teachings were transmitted.

The problem: asceticism and urban life

An instructive story tells of a Thai woman who had long lived in England. She became increasingly subject to a vague depression which eventually became quite disabling, until she realized what was wrong when she was introduced to a vihāra and was able to make religious offerings to the monks; it brought instant release from her burden of worries. 'That is what is wrong with living in this country,' she said. 'There are simply no opportunities to give.' Much could be learned from contemplation of this parable, but one simple fact matters here: the role of the Buddhist Order makes sense in a particular social environment with a particular culture, in terms of which people see each other and behave towards each other.

How, then, did Buddhism grow in the India of about 500 BCE? This India was not like modern England; it was not like modern Thailand either. So what sort of environment was it that shaped the emergence of the dhamma and the behaviour of the monks? What strikes the historian most is that cities were growing, many of them capitals of rising kingdoms. Agriculture and trade networks were developing. This environment must have been relevant to the appeal of Buddhism, and of the other new non-brāhmaṇical teachings.

Did the dhamma make sense to people because in some way it fitted the needs of these rising urban states? Or did it provide instead a spiritual salve, an opiate, for those who suffered from the effects of urbanization? These are two opposing sorts of interpretation; scholars argue strongly on both sides. The problem to be taken up here is just this fact; it is a curious fact, because scholars argue on both sides often without seeming to notice the contradiction.

THE EMPEROR'S CLOTHES

Let us take first the explanation that Buddhism fitted the needs of rising urban states. It goes somewhat as follows. The Buddha was a wandering holy man who insisted the only way to find salvation lies in the total renunciation of life in society and all its values. He sought disciples who should wear rags and eat left-overs, rejecting all responsibility to their families, seeking spiritual enlightenment, and rejecting all worldly involvement. His teaching earned royal patronage and social prestige. Why? Because it met the needs of a newly urbanized society; it appealed to the urbane, cosmopolitan values of ambitious traders surrounded by new luxuries and immersed in practical affairs; it found disciples whose outlook was shaped by an expanding economy, by the wider horizons of growing states seeking regional conquest.

It is difficult to resist a popular cliché: what is wrong with this picture? Buddhism, on the view of much relevant scholarship, is the ideology of a mature process of urbanism, and this is odd because the Buddha's message, as just described, appears to be as far removed as one can very well imagine from the needs and temper of urban life.¹ There is a further oddity, because little notice has been taken of the obvious inconsistency between the explanation and the thing explained; most accept that there was indeed a profound affinity between Buddhism (however other-worldly) and the spirit of urbanization (however mundane). It is as if people were to be swept by admiration for the naked emperor's clothes.

Certainly there are ways of accounting for these two oddities. One, which must be noticed at once but will here be put on one side for a while, is that the account of the Buddha's original message given above is false, or at least misrepresented by the omission of its public, ethical and social dimensions. This is a possible objection, for of course the social dimensions cannot be left out. They are indeed, in large measure, the subject-matter of this volume. A number of historians of Buddhism, especially those who belong to what has sometimes been dubbed the 'Franco-Belgian school', have rejected the ascetic, soteriological description of the Buddha's teaching in favour of something much more likely to appeal to ordinary people. A life-denying other-worldly figure could not have attracted crowds of supporters, they think. As Lamotte declared, 'We would search in vain for the transcendent quality which could attract crowds to the support of a personality so lacking in lustre and dynamism.'²

It will be argued here later on that this supposition misses the point; the dynamism of a holy man's appeal could be compelling, and the more austere he was, the better. Here, though, three points must be considered. The first is that the scriptures themselves are not univocal; they contain evidence capable of supporting discrepant interpretations of the Buddhist teaching. On the one hand, it can be seen as the sort of private, inward-looking soteriological quest described above, and on the other it can be seen as a code of public morality. The two ingredients do not obviously mix. In a sense, this conflict need not matter; life does not imitate logic, and indeed, the quest for an internally consistent original Buddhism often encourages a mistaken view of Buddhism's social dynamics. However, the original message as intended by the Buddha himself is not the same thing as the subsequent dynamics of his teaching in society, and there was presumably substantial coherence to what he said and meant.

¹ One of the few who have commented upon this inconsistency is J. W. de Jong. 'It is however much more difficult to understand why members from the urban elite should abandon everything in order to strive for salvation.' J. W. de Jong, review of R. Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, II, 32 (1989), p. 24f.

² E. Lamotte, 'La légende du Buddha,' Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, 134 (1946), p. 40.

The second point is that, if there was an internally coherent original Buddhism embodied in the Buddha's own words and behaviour, the ascetic other-worldly version of it is as likely to be true as any. Therefore, the representation of the Buddha's teaching as a soteriological and transcendental message totally alien to any social form except ascetic isolationism is a reasonable initial hypothesis.

Thirdly, we must look beyond the Buddha himself in pursuit of the reasons for the attraction of a variety of classes of people to Buddhism as both philosophy and practice. Exploration of the texts dealing with monks other than the Buddha shows us that they adapted to several different role models, such as that of parish preacher (where the village functions like a small parish), charismatic teacher, and forest-dwelling ascetic – consistently with a complex society, even if all of them took some coloration from the values of the ascetic quest.

For the time being, though, we shall recognize two ways of describing the nature of the Buddha's message, acknowledging that the evidence may never allow us to prove just one to be correct. The first (the 'asocial' image) is to treat Buddhism as an austere, other-worldly quest for salvation, rejecting life in society. The second (the 'social' image) is to treat Buddhism as a system of religious life embracing society as a whole, with ethical and social teachings. This latter way is widely favoured by scholars. The first way is nevertheless favoured here provisionally; more will be said below to justify this.

TRADE, CITIES, CENTRALIZED STATES AND REMEMBERED TRIBALISM

The arguments relating the rise of Buddhism to urbanization and state formation can be classified under four headings according as they bear upon the relevance of Buddhism

- (1) to the values of merchants,
- (2) to the nature of city life,
- (3) to political organization in the urban-based centralized state, and
- (4) to the shift from pastoral to agrarian culture which economically underpinned the rise of cities.

A brief survey of these arguments follows directly, the intention of which is neither to endorse nor to reject the arguments described, merely to identify them. Some indeed offer valuable contributions to our understanding of the social appeal of Buddhism. The problem lies elsewhere. For in respect of each of the four aspects considered, we find that, confusingly, while some people have argued that Buddhism appealed because it legitimated or endorsed the values of the new urban state, others have argued that Buddhism appealed because it rejected them, offering an alternative ideology or style of life attractive to the dispossessed or the alienated.

Under each of the four headings we can find arguments claiming that Buddhism reflected the new values (which will be called here the positive style of argument), and other arguments claiming that Buddhism rejected them (the negative). The positive opinion can fairly be described as the majority opinion within the scholarship on the period of urbanization. It is so often met with in this context that it virtually amounts to a tenet of received wisdom that Buddhism flourished essentially on account of its appeal in the urbanized society of the rising urban state. The other view, the negative, does not so often appear in research on early Buddhist history, and is in that sense a minority opinion; but it is implicit in much of what has been written about ancient India and about Buddhism. It is often treated without examination, as self-evident, that Buddhism rejected the values of the urban state; it is implied wherever Buddhism's rise is attributed to its teaching about dukkha.

LEGITIMATION OF COMMERCIAL VALUES

Take first the values of merchants. Weber himself pointed to the appeal to the merchants and craftsmen of new schools founded by wandering mendicants.³ Some scholars make explicit the parallel with Calvinism and capitalism, suggesting that, like Protestantism, Buddhism and the other heterodox movements valued achieved, not ascribed, status, and offered self-respect to merchants, whereas orthodoxy (Roman Catholic or brāhmaṇical) discriminated against them.⁴ Several commentators attach weight to the universalistic values of Buddhist morality, which meant that merchants, whatever their birth, would not suffer discrimination from co-religionists; Buddhism appealed to the nouveaux riches and found an affinity with the bourgeois ethic of thrift and diligence.⁵ M. Carrithers recognizes an 'elective affinity' between Buddhism and city merchants,⁶ and S. Collins suggests a consonance between the Buddhist idea of universal order and 'commercial rationalism'.⁷

³ M. Weber, Die Wirtschaftsethik der Weltreligionen. Hinduismus und Buddhismus, ed. H. Schmidt-Glintzer (J.C.B. Mohr, Tübingen, 1998 (Tübingen, 1921)), pp. 34–8. In this respect he gave particular attention to Jainism. However, the main thrust of his argument about India is that the brāhmanical order and the institutions of caste prevented the development of fully urban society uniting the interests of princes and merchants.

Buddhism and the other new teachings suited the commercial classes in the cities and Buddhism, like Jainism, provided for the merchants the 'required ethic'.⁸ Merchants, some have said, were out of sympathy with brāhmaṇical teachings, which offered them neither status nor sanction for their livelihood.⁹ R. S. Sharma argues that, whereas brāhmaṇical sources despise commerce, Buddhism looked favourably upon trade, numbered great merchants among its early supporters, happily tolerated money lending (unlike brāhmaṇical authorities¹⁰), implicitly sanctioned usury and praised freedom from debt without condemning indebtedness on principle.¹¹

The money economy, an important part of commercial culture, was on some views complementary to Buddhist values;¹² in a society where status

⁴ A. L. Basham, 'The background to the rise of Buddhism', in A. K. Narain (ed.), Studies in History (B.R. Publishing, Delhi, 1980).

⁵ Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, p. 78. Cf. von Simson, 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund', pp. 92–4; U. Chakravarti, The Social Dimensions of Early Buddhism (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1987), p. 179.

⁶ M. Carrithers, The Buddha (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1983), p. 84, to which Carrithers adds that the message of the Buddha was universal and appealed to other classes besides merchants.

⁷ S. Collins, Selfless Persons: Imagery and Thought in Theravāda Buddhism (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1982), p. 108. Collins refers to Weber's association of new religious ideas with urban life, but does not endorse his linking of the psychology of fatalism with mercantile culture.

⁸ Basham, 'Background', p. 73; R. Thapar, Ancient Indian Social History: Some Interpretations (Orient Longman, New Delhi, 1978), p. 73.

⁹ K. T. Sarao, Urban Centres and Urbanisation as Reflected in the Pāli Vinaya and Sutta Piṭakas (Vidyānidhi, Delhi, 1990), pp. 175ff.; cf. Thapar, Ancient Indian Social History, pp. 44, 61 n. 5.

¹⁰ The Vedic texts are not explored here, but the point is worth noticing. Āpastamba described usury as polluting. For instance, Āpastamba Dhṣ 1,18,22 prescribes that food offered by a usurer is not to be eaten by a brahman student and Baudhāyana Dhṣ 1,10,23 condemns buying cheap and selling dear. This brāhmaṇical stricture needs to be seen in the context of the traditionally sanctioned forms of payments for brahmans, namely, cattle, gold and women.

¹¹ R. S. Sharma, Material Culture and Social Formations in Ancient India (Macmillan India, Delhi, 1983), pp. 123–6.

¹² G. C. Pande, Studies in the Origins of Buddhism (Motilal Banarsidass, Delhi, 1974 (Department of Ancient History, Culture and Archeology, University of Allahabad, 1957)), p. 314, n. 27.

came to be based more on wealth, less on birth, a man was as good as the colour of his money.¹³ The karma doctrine justified present wealth (reward for past merit), and assured future benefit for present merit.¹⁴

PROTEST AGAINST COMMERCIAL VALUES

In a word, the claim is that Buddhism displayed an affinity to the values of merchants. But it is possible to argue otherwise. In some ways, it might be said that Buddhism is antipathetic to the rise of commercial values, and this very claim has often enough been made in favour of the urbanization hypothesis, sometimes by the same people who argue that Buddhism appealed to the merchant classes. A. K. Narain's interpretation of the Buddhist appeal links commerce with the city environment as a cause of unequal prosperity which exacerbated problems of supply and demand, leading to unhappiness and disenchantment; Buddhism was in part a reaction against the 'mechanisms of affluence'.¹⁵ The Buddhist community of monks forbade its members the use of money and the accumulation of possessions; their customs represented a rejection of new social elements such as love of money, private property and luxury. The monks' lifestyle was austere; they were not to accept money or engage in buying or selling; their code reflects 'to some extent a reaction against these new elements'.¹⁶ The renouncers represented a universal code of behaviour apt for the laity in cities where 'now there were merchants who, through command of the impersonal instruments of money and trade, could wreak a new damage on others'.¹⁷

This form of the argument is perhaps easier to understand than its reverse. If original Buddhism was (on the initial hypothesis adopted provisionally here) a movement that rejected all social values and sought transcendent illumination outside society, we can imagine how its appeal might be related to commercial culture as a reaction against it, not as a legitimization of it. People disgusted by what they saw as an excess of selfish greed, passion and delusion might turn to their opposite.

LEGITIMATION OF CITY LIFE

There is a similar oscillation in the forms taken by the argument for Buddhism as a response to the nature of city life. For some authorities, ¹³ Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, p. 81.

¹⁴ von Simson, 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund', pp. 92-4.

¹⁵ Narain, ed., Studies in History, p. xvi.

¹⁶ Such as textiles and leather goods. Sharma, Material Culture, p. 128.

¹⁷ Carrithers, Buddha, p. 86.

the new teaching supplied an ideological sanction for urban culture.¹⁸ Weber wrote: 'Like Jainism, but even more clearly, Buddhism presents itself as a product of the time of urban development, of urban kingship and the city nobles.'¹⁹ The fluid structure of urban society demanded a cosmopolitan culture in which people could question the values of the old particularistic traditions.²⁰ Gokhale argues that Buddhism as a teaching for society reflected the 'demands of the New Man'. He wrote: 'The new age that was dawning demanded new forms of political organization and a reevaluation of norms of social behaviour and formulation of new social goals. The history of early Buddhism reflects the elements of crisis as also the attempts made to crystallize and express the new social outlook.'²¹

The old brāhmaṇical culture was, at least in the early period of urbanization, antipathetic to city life. The priestly codes of law and ritual found no place for state officials, or for traders; brāhmaṇical authority advised against visiting cities, and forbade the recitation of the Vedas in their polluting environment.²² Buddhism, unlike the ritualistic priestly codes, could countenance a way of life that included eating houses (whereas Āpastamba prohibited the consumption of shop food) and prostitution (a famous benefactrix of the saṅgha was a courtesan).²³

PROTEST AGAINST CITY LIFE

So Buddhism was an ideology to serve the new age of urbanism. But, alternatively or perhaps even simultaneously, it was a reaction against this new environment, from which many sought spiritual refreshment in the wilderness. This point of view is succinctly argued by A. K. Narain:

¹⁸ Duad Ali sees a subtle isomorphism between the Buddhist Vinaya discipline and the principles of urban sophistication: 'Technologies of the self: courtly artifice and monastic discipline in early India', JESHO, 41 (1998), pp. 159–84.

¹⁹ Max Weber, The Religion of India: the sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism, trans. and ed. Hans H. Gerth and Don Martindale (Free Press, Glencoe, Ill., 1958/1962), p. 204.

²⁰ Carrithers, Buddha, pp. 10f.

²¹ B. G. Gokhale, 'The Buddhist social ideals', Indian Historical Quarterly, 32 (1957), pp. 141f.

²² P. Olivelle, Samnyāsa Upaniṣads: Hindu Scriptures on Asceticism and Renunciation (Oxford University Press, New York, 1992), pp. 38ff. Āpastamba Dhṣ 1, 32, 19–21 warns a brahman teacher against frequenting crowds and entering towns (cf. Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, p. 55). See also Baudhāyana Dhṣ 2, 6, 33, 'A man who keeps himself well under control will attain final bliss even if he lives in a city with his body covered with the city dust and his eyes and face coated with it' – now that is something impossible.' (Trans. Patrick Olivelle, in Dharmasutras: the law codes of Āpastamba, Gautama, Baudhāyana, and Vasīṣṭha. Annotated text and translation (Motilal Banarsidass, New Delhi, 2000), p. 265.

²³ Sharma, Material Culture, p. 126. See Āpastamba Dhṣ 1, 17, 14, 'He should not eat food obtained from the market.'

This urbanism led to material prosperity . . . suffering on account of tensions of life and insecurity of the person, and also to a concern for the preservation of the fauna and flora, which were being destroyed by the rise of cities and self-indulgent, savage rituals and games. All these factors were indeed sufficient to drive some out of the cities to wander forth in search of an end to suffering . . .²⁴

One feature of city life that could have bred disenchantment with materialism was the suffering brought by disease, for in the warm wet lower Ganges area plague is likely to have been rife; as McNeill has suggested, the rise of the bigger cities could well have contributed to the spread of disease.²⁵ Such facts have been adduced by some scholars in support of the view that Buddhism appealed to those who suffered as a result of urbanization.²⁶ Using Drekeimer's concept of 'tribal trauma', F. Reynolds has argued that the social changes attending urbanization eventually alienated people and engendered 'lostness and despair';²⁷ people were acutely conscious of the extremes of wealth and poverty, and economic developments often involved oppression and brought social distress in their wake. Gombrich suggested a link between urbanism and spiritual malaise as a condition for the appeal of Buddhism.²⁸ Pande refers to the 'pessimistic Weltanschauung' developing at the end of the Vedic period as population moved into new regions difficult to pioneer: 'These circumstances must have created a feeling of distress and despair in the minds of many.'²⁹

LEGITIMATION OF THE CENTRALIZED STATE

With the rise of cities went the rise of a new sort of state, more centralized in its organization and impersonal in its political culture, with a growing corps of bureaucrats. The canonical scriptures often refer to early Buddhist teachers as being consulted by the rulers of some of these kingdoms, and one could well link the Buddhist dharma with the new political order, whether as a rationalization of it or as a reaction against it.

On the one hand, Buddhism appealed as an ideology for the new commonwealth, which needed a set of uniform standards that would apply ²⁴ Narain (ed), Studies in History, p. xxvi.

²⁵ W. McNeill, Plagues and Peoples (Anchor, New York, 1976), pp. 81ff., 95.

²⁶ See Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, pp. 58ff., and Olivelle, Samnyāsa Upaniṣads, pp. 34f. McNeill's argument (see previous note) – linking epidemiology with political, social and cultural structures – indicates a direction in which future research could profitably move. See also de Jong, review of Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, pp. 239–42.

²⁷ F. Reynolds, 'The two wheels of dharma: a study of early Buddhism,' in G. Obeyesekere, F. Reynolds and B. L. Smith, The Two Wheels of dharma: Essays on the Theravāda Tradition in India and Ceylon (The American Academy of Religion, Chambersburg, Pa., 1972), pp. 6–30.

²⁸ Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, p. 57. ²⁹ Pande, Studies, p. 264, 328.

equally to all the cultural groups beneath the ruler's sceptre instead of being rooted in the traditions of any one. Buddhism filled this need; it cut across lineage and caste ties. Further, according to R. Thapar, its doctrines of karma and saṃsāra, reconciling men to a life of suffering, were a sedative to quell dissidence and encourage the acceptance of authority.³⁰ It was much more apt as a public code than the brāhmaṇical prescriptions; it offered scientific values instead of moralizing restraints.³¹ Buddhism's opposition to many of the brāhmaṇical claims made it a natural ally of the rājanya,³² who sought to enlist the heads of mendicant orders as agents of central control, managing recruitment into their sects to serve state interest and giving moral support against the brahmins.³³ Buddhism favoured the values of the new political order, describing the ḷṣatriya as the 'protector of the fields' and denying ordination to deserters and criminals in acknowledgment of obligations to the ruler.³⁴

PROTEST AGAINST THE CENTRALIZED STATE

On the other hand, Buddhism can be seen as a voice of protest against the new political order of the centralizing monarchies of the Ganges basin.³⁵ Buddhism, it might be argued, could appeal to those alienated by the new state, such as the ḷṣatriyas.³⁶ Buddhism and the other heterodoxies, especially Jainism, embodied with their teaching of ahiṃsā (non-injury) an alternative public morality to a state gospel that increasingly recognized official violence and coercion.³⁷ Again, it has been claimed that Buddhism represented a rejection of the demands made by the new state apparatus, which the economy was scarcely able to support.³⁸ Injustice accompanied official violence; cities became 'centres of corruption and bribery',³⁹ compelling citizens to look for spiritual solace. Kings waged wars in pursuit of ³⁰ R. Thapar, From Lineage to State (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1984), p. 150.

³¹ von Simson, 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund', p. 96. ³² Collins, Selfless Persons, p. 38.

³³ A. K. Warder, 'On the relationships between Buddhism and other contemporary systems', Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, 18 (1956), p. 48.

³⁴ Sharma, Material Culture, p. 126.

³⁵ J. W. de Jong, 'The background of early Buddhism', Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies, 12 (1964), p. 46, offers an account of early Buddhism and the state which combines positive and negative. Buddhism's rationality suited the new rulers, whereas the old aristocracies they marginalized were alienated, ready to turn to Buddhism.

³⁶ Chakravarti, Social Dimensions, pp. 147-8. ³⁷ Thapar, Ancient Indian Social History, p. 55.

³⁸ McNeill, Plagues, pp. 94ff. points to a sense in which Buddhism (and in this view Hinduism also), with its rejection of political involvement, could be imagined to have appealed to those who turned their backs on a nascent state whose exactions were too heavy to bear.

³⁹ Sarao, Urban Centres, pp. 175ff.

their imperial dreams, bringing untold suffering to their subjects,⁴⁰ who were thus ripe for a religion predicated upon the prime fact of suffering as a condition of life. A fatalistic system like that of the Ājīvikas was 'eminently suited' to transforming society in a strong, dominant state; 'In this environment Buddhism, and to a lesser extent Jainism, reflected the desire to . . . evade or soften autocratic government.'⁴¹ In such respects as these (some have argued), Buddhism gained support in reaction against the political order of the centralizing regional kingdoms, not as a legitimizing ideology for it.

LEGITIMATION OF POST-TRIBAL CULTURE

A fourth way in which Buddhism can be related to urbanization concerns its relations with the values of agrarian society. Agricultural surpluses supported, and were perhaps politically created by, the needs of the Ganges valley cities. Agrarian values evolve as part of the same process that generates urban societies. Buddhism might be thought of, in this case, either as a celebration of sedentary agrarian values superseding the nomadic tribal ways, or as thriving on nostalgia for them in reaction against agrarian values.

Several scholars have taken up the theme of animal sacrifice, which might well be regarded as an emblem of the tribal Vedic culture with its elaborate ritual. The idea was perhaps first given currency by D. D. Kosambi.⁴² Others have taken it up. R. S. Sharma, for example, refers to the Vedic texts requiring senseless slaughter for sacrifice and argues that Pāli scriptures express values appropriate to the new agricultural environment.⁴³ One can see this value as utilitarian – in the crowded lands of the doab, cattle were a scarce resource to be husbanded, not wasted in conspicuous sacrificial consumption. Alternatively, one can see the opposition to Vedic animal sacrifices as the expression of a moral value – non-injury or ahiṃsā.⁴⁴ In this ⁴⁰ Pande, Studies, pp. 327ff. Contrast T. W. Rhys Davids, who (being overly romantic) thought that material conditions for ordinary people in the Indian cities were not oppressive; 'of want, as known in our great cities, there is no evidence'. T. W. Rhys Davids, Buddhist India (T. Fisher Unwin, London, 1903), p. 101.

⁴¹ Warder, 'Relationships', p. 44.

⁴² D. D. Kosambi, 'Early stages of the caste system in northern India', Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 22 (1946), p. 45, who argued that the old Vedic order was predicated on a religious idea involving slaughter for sacrifice; the new order similarly based its rejection of slaughter upon religious grounds but had economic justification in rejecting practices that were uneconomic in the change to agriculture.

⁴³ Sharma, Material Culture, pp. 109, 118ff., 121. Cf. Thapar, Ancient Indian Social History, p. 54.

⁴⁴ T. W. Rhys Davids, Dialogues of the Buddha (PTS, London, reprint 1973), vol. 1, pp. 160–6, comments that the ironic disparagement of elaborate animal sacrifices found here reflects a big victory for ahiṃsā in India.

case the Buddhist adoption of it can be regarded as a feature of urban culture, for it was city folk who could afford to abstain from harming animals; farmers followed a way of life in which strict ahimsā was impossible.⁴⁵ Either way, Buddhism stood for the new civilization of the northeast and the rising kingdoms, while brahmanism remained linked with the civilization of the northwest and the Vedas. Von Simson has argued that the Vedic religion, with its ideas of sacred place and time, its divinization of the forces of nature, its calendar myths, its seasonal rituals and above all its exalting of the concept of sustenance, is wedded to the agricultural or pastoral way of life, in contrast to the quest for salvation represented by the heterodox teachings such as Buddhism.⁴⁶ From this point of view, Buddhism needs to be aligned with urban civilization, as opposed to both agricultural and pastoral values.

PROTEST AGAINST POST-TRIBAL CULTURE

Equally, however, Buddhism might be seen as a reaction against the whole movement of civilization from its pastoral origins in the hills, where men were surrounded by nature and governed by its rhythms, to the artificiality of the man-made landscape and the urban anonymity of the relatively densely populated agricultural plains.⁴⁷ D. P. Chattopadhyaya has pointed to the fact that the Aggañña Suttanta represents the move from gathering to hoarding grain as a part of the degeneration of society; Buddhism looked back to the values of the 'tribal collective'. The 'early rules envisage a kind of primitive communism based on low standards of pre-field agriculture and of pre-trade, tribal life'.⁴⁸

One strand of argument aligns Buddhism with the old tribal society by identifying the non-monarchical gana communities of the northern foothills and the northwest as representative of the old culture. Some have considered that Buddhism represented the world view of the older aristocratic gana communities in opposition to centralized power, preferring the 'utopian egalitarianism of pristine society'.⁴⁹ Again, Buddhism and Jainism have been seen as a 'moral counter-attack' by the ⁴⁵ Thapar, Ancient Indian Social History, p. 54.

⁴⁶ von Simson, 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund', p. 93. ⁴⁷ Sharma, Material Culture, p. 128.

⁴⁸ D. P. Chattopadhyaya, Lokāyata. A study in ancient Indian materialism (People's Publishing House, Delhi, 1959/1973), p. 481.

⁴⁹ Thapar, Ancient Indian Social History, p. 88. The author also suggests, however, that perhaps the gana communities with their less authoritarian ideology acted as safety valves for the 'containment of political dissidence'.

indigenous culture of the tribal oligarchies against encroaching Indo-Aryan stratification.⁵⁰

CRITIQUE OF THE ARGUMENTS CONCERNING URBANIZATION

In respect of each of the four identified aspects of urbanization, scholars have argued variously that Buddhism can be seen to have appealed because it was in tune with the changes associated with urbanization, being apt to legitimate or encode them, and that on the other hand Buddhism can be seen to have appealed because it was apt as a voice for those who suffered from the changes and sought an alternative world view. Some of the arguments embody valuable insights. Some others are too glib and as they stand leave too many questions unanswered to carry conviction. There is something precarious about the whole framework of the discussion. (It is not exactly a debate, for the protagonists normally do not acknowledge, or seek to resolve, the contradictions that divide them.) Too often, highly speculative assumptions are treated as self-evident.

The arguments just summarized do not amount to a convincing case, on either side. Let us first look at the claim that Buddhism favoured the values of merchants. We cannot deny the connection between the new religions and the mercantile classes, yet we can ask why these classes demanded an intellectual contextualization and justification for their style of life. Commerce, like agriculture, was certainly not new. Both are recorded frequently, if lacking in detail, in the Brāhmaṇas.⁵¹ If they had already existed, why did they demand intellectual justification in a new form and reorientation of culture in respect of a new set of values?

One can indeed appeal to the presumed congruity between the commercial spirit and the peripatetic Buddhist tradition. But is this enough? To draw out more fully the analogy as forming the basis of a strong material and intellectual interaction between Buddhism and mercantile activity, it is necessary to show why traders, shopkeepers, small businessmen and wealthy farmers experienced a need for intellectual validation, and how this need was met by Buddhism. Moreover, if such a need can be isolated, we must still ask whether the 'mercantilist sphere', to use a very general term, was attracted to the Buddhist message, to its practitioners, or to both. Regrettably, the situation portrayed by the literature is sketchy: mercantilism is a distinctive part of an expanding economy, self-confidently aware of its own role and capable of engaging in a kind of sumptuary display. If Buddhism did have a function in its rise and continuing expansion in a growing economy, this function must have been to promote its distinctiveness and to value positively the material achievements of the mercantile class. In one sense the merchants were a sort of counterweight to the brahmins. These were the two most visible groups to emerge with late Vedic culture. Neither held coercive power; both were fashioning highly distinctive values and subcultures, the one with a material raison d'être and the other with a religious. It was natural for the Buddhists to support the mercantile groups as these (1) provided them with material resources, and (2) were not obliged to regard them as competitors, as the brahmins clearly did. In so far as there was a mercantilist ideology, it was natural for the Buddhists to seek an affinity in it. But of course, the claim that Buddhism favoured merchant values would be more convincing if we had some specific knowledge of the content of these values. Everything rests at present on inference,⁵² except perhaps what we can glean from texts like the Sigālovādasutta.⁵³ More obviously congruent with the original message of Buddhism is the opposite view, arguing instead that Buddhism was a counter or alternative to the materialist society of the new cities where money ruled. This view, though, fails to clarify in what precise manner the renouncer would have represented a universal code of behaviour for the laity in cities.⁵⁴ By a certain stage of economic development (probably later than the rise of Buddhism), the laity were required to deal with money, and certainly did not have the luxury of doing without it or begging for their food. For them this kind of activity was not an option, whereas for the monks it was obligatory. If the universal code of monks was translated into a form taken up by the laity, it could only have been a limited section of this code – whatever could guide the dealings of the laity with other people.

⁵⁰ G. Erdosy, 'Early historic cities of northern India', South Asian Studies, 3 (1987), p. 15. Chattopadhyaya (Lokāyata, pp. 483 and 491) also regards the organization of the Buddhist Order as modelled on the (assumed) collective communities of old tribal culture.

⁵¹ See W. Rau, Staat und Gesellschaft Im Alten Indien nach den Brāhmaṇatexten Dargestellt (Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, 1957), p. 52. Cf. R. Thapar, 'The First Millennium B.C. in northern India', in R. Thapar, ed., Recent Perspectives of Early Indian History (Popular Prakashan, Bombay, 1995), pp. 92-3.

⁵² Even in the otherwise useful article by B. G. Gokhale, 'The merchant in ancient India', Journal of the American Oriental Society, 97 (1977), pp. 125–30, we find little about mercantile values either in an ideological or in a behavioural sense.

⁵³ The Sigālovādasutta (D III 180–3) certainly appears to endorse 'bourgeois' values, and has been abundantly cited in the modern literature as evidence of the Buddha's social concerns. The very fact that it is so often cited is evidence of its special character. It is not representative of the concerns of the early Nikāyas as a whole.

⁵⁴ Sarkisyanz can argue in the opposite direction; the universalistic ethics of Buddhism were economically less practical than the Hindu mercantile caste ethos, or the Realpolitik of Hindu kings, for they were abstract and pious, not geared to action in the real world. See E. Sarkisyanz, Buddhist Backgrounds of the Burmese Revolution (Nijhoff, The Hague, 1965), pp. 80ff., 143.

They still had to conduct their lives within the secular economic order. We would rather argue that the renouncers represented the higher ideals associated with transcendent values, and we are yet to see how these values translate into those of the laity except as rather abstract high-flown moral principles.

So what about the claim that Buddhism favoured the culture of the new urban society? We could well question whether people at the time recognized themselves as entering a 'new age'. Were they not, more likely, encountering ad hoc a range of piecemeal changes, some of which they tried to insulate themselves against, while attempting to adapt to others? It is the recognition of the 'new' and the consciousness of this that require more elaboration here. Buddhism was more attuned to the context of city life than brahmanism, more tolerant of institutions such as brothels and communal eating-places, and in this sense it was broader in its acceptance of people of divergent classes and customs than was brahmanism in a practical sense. Yet there was not just one brāhmaṇical religion, there were several under one broad rubric, which changed dramatically and became much more adaptable under the influence of devotional values and practices. These were emerging at the same time as Buddhism was initially expanding. Moreover, it was very likely that brahmins followed a variety of occupations whilst still calling themselves brahmins, and retained the privileges that went with that title.

What then of the claim that Buddhism at least had universal values, apt for the cosmopolitan city environment, unlike the particularistic brāhmaṇical code? Indological scholarship seems to assume brahmins had no universalistic theories, though the much later varṇāśrama theory and the trivarga do indeed aim at a totalistic world view of universal scope. This lack of recognition arises perhaps because many find it difficult to recognize compatibility between a universalistic outlook and a particularistic view of social class, yet the two need not be mutually exclusive.

If Indologists persist in accusing brahmins of lacking universalistic theories, it may be because brahmins are believed to have been preoccupied with ritual theory, as embodied in the huge ritual texts – the Brāhmaṇas. These texts, like much of late Vedic and early post-Vedic literature and certain of the śrauta rituals, promote the image of the brahmin as obsessed with ritual performance, as indeed do certain famous passages in the Buddhist Sutta Nipāta and the Jātakas. Yet what nomadic economy could have supported a large group of non-producing ritual and legal specialists who claimed to be both within and outside of society? True, society did eventually support economically the (much cheaper) ascetic groups, but this was well after the social pre-eminence of the brahmins had been firmly established. As we will see in chapter 5, the brahmins were much more adaptable and worldly than is commonly thought, and this was one reason for the Buddha's own antipathy towards them.

But what about the claim that Buddhism appealed to those who suffered from urbanization? Some have argued that the alienating environment of the city engendered feelings even of despair. The argument turns on a view of change in history. The ascetic tradition represented by Buddhism, the Upaniṣadic sages and the early Jains placed great emphasis on the transitoriness of human existence in any dimension that could be named. It is tempting, if not natural, for scholars to try and locate some kind of direct connection between the socio-economic conditions and the emergence of a theory of change, both sophisticated and universal, in ancient Indian thought. The tone of universal dissatisfaction implied in the concept of dukkha has sometimes been read back into a kind of social Angst somewhere in the psyche of the residents of the Ganges valley. The reasoning is scarcely convincing. The notion of dukkha is normally formulated in broad generic terms that do not allow us to identify, as specific causes of dissatisfaction, particular changes in the non-religious and non-speculative areas of life. As for the doctrine of impermanence, we still do not know from where or how the Buddha himself developed his universalistic theory. If there is any real connection between doctrine and social environment, we cannot know it without a much more detailed understanding of the background than is at present possible. We would need to know whether the rate of change, however it might be defined, was especially pronounced during the Buddha's time, and whether the elites with whom the Buddha interacted retained nostalgic memories of a more stable, peaceful era.

To recognize this problem is to see the difficulties of reasoning convincingly from even a very central doctrine of Buddhism to socio-economic conditions that may have contributed to the Buddha's formulation of this doctrine. We see how insecurely founded is the glib notion that the early canonical texts both embody a teaching that must have appealed to the alienated, the disenfranchised, the dispossessed, and also reflect a period of social dislocation occurring when they were composed. Both propositions are problematic. The teaching of dukkha need not go with social distress; the canonical texts might reflect any combination of times, and any or none of these times may have been characterized by either slow or rapid change. For the most part the changes wrought by urbanization and state formation had already become well established by the time the Buddhist texts took the form in which we know them; at any rate, parts of them offer a picture of urban society that had been maturing for some time.⁵⁵

It is not clear that urbanization in itself must have created such a feeling of despair in the minds of so many. These people were not so unadaptable as to be incapable of responding to changes which came upon them, particularly since (we have no grounds to doubt) these changes were gradual. Few who argue in this way spell out, in detail, the mechanism by which traumatic alienation is supposed to have engendered a spiritual turn and the emergence of the ascetic groups. Yet we surely need to have it fully explained, since all of the ascetic groups place so much emphasis on dukkha as a universal condition, without any emphasis upon the particular conditions of city life. (As we saw, it is brāhmaṇical texts which spurn city life.) A really convincing answer has not been given to the question why city dwellers in particular should have turned to a doctrine of total detachment from society. We conclude that, on the available evidence, early Buddhism, as embodied in its monks and laity, is a social and religious movement adapting itself to an expanding society where the economy is experiencing steady growth and a degree of prosperity.

By and large, what goes for the urban environment goes for the new rising state, which normally was based in a growing city. Some claim that Buddhism favoured the rising kingdoms, and that monks often gave rulers advice. But it is really only the Buddha and perhaps Ānanda, and Devadatta from a different perspective, who are portrayed in this role. One could hardly mount a strong argument upon the canonical evidence.

Perhaps there is a better argument that Buddhism supported the state because its doctrines of saṃsāra and karma provided a rationale for acceptance of authority, a sort of fatalism that would legitimate an authoritarian regime. This remains problematic given that ancient India does not present a picture of acceptance and submission, nor do any of the literary sources, Hindu or Buddhist, provide good evidence for such a conclusion. The doctrine of karma (and puruṣakara in the Mahābhārata) could equally support the contrary view: that the only way to confront universal dukkha was to work hard at producing good karma (including political reform) for the future (and hence future happiness).

So what about the opposite argument that Buddhism appealed to those alienated by the rising monarchical regimes, notably the kṣatriyas? Once again this argument assumes that the only possibility for the 'alienated aristocracy' was to seek a new ideology. Why should this be so? Were no other possibilities available in a society and economy expanding with scarcely any restraint on available resources?⁵⁶

⁵⁵ A similar view has been put by M. Witzel, 'Tracing the Vedic dialects', in C. Caillat (ed.), Dialectes dans les littératures indo-aryennes (Institut de Civilisation Indienne, Collège de France, Paris, 1991), p. 245. Cf. W. Rau, Zur vedischen Altertumskunde (Akademie der Wissenschaft und der Literatur, Mainz, 1983), p. 21, n. 12.

But it was not only the kṣatriya elite within the dominant culture, it was the mass of ordinary people now subjected to the expansion of autocratic power that can be seen as the natural audience for the Buddhist message. With monarchy came the ladder of degree, and we can imagine Buddhism as a voice of protest against it. However, to the extent that the Buddhists formed part of any form of social organization, they maintained a separate community, operating with achieved status, alongside the increasingly stratified secular world. While the Buddha criticized ascribed status, he did not actively seek reforms or fight stratification. As an actor in society Buddhism was complex and multi-faceted, resisting any simple characterization.

The austere and parsimonious lifestyle of the monks may be thought to imply a criticism of the hierarchical state; but equally it could reflect a repudiation of the self-indulgence fostered by an expanding economy. This leads us to the fourth and last category of interpretation: Buddhism as either a protagonist or a critic of the older nomadic or agrarian society, in contrast to the new urban one. Those who see Buddhism as standing for the new society emphasize its contrast with the sacrificial and ritual character of the old Vedic religion that went with tribal society. The contrast is real enough, but we must beware of simplistic categorization, pigeon-holing ritual with tribalism and the inner religious quest with urbanism. A priori, such an alignment is counter-intuitive, and later history scarcely bears it out; highly urbanized royal capitals became centres of brāhmaṇical ritual.

On the other hand, it would be unwise to assume glibly that Buddhism stood for the old ways of a simpler, kinder society, where a tribal collective protected people from the abuses of 'individualism'. We can scarcely identify the early saṅgha with a primitive subsistence economy. Surely those who steered the Buddhist Order through its formative period knew well how much they depended upon an expanding economy. Accordingly, they adapted skilfully to the new socio-economic conditions, without compromising their fundamental religious position.

⁵⁶ It could further be asked how we know the ruler bypassed the kṣatriya as his agents. Perhaps they were potential competitors with an aspiring sole ruler, an interpretation supported on the analogy of the kind of alliances portrayed in the Mahābhārata. Again, the armies of officials described in the Arthasāstra may reflect the practice of recruiting 'new men', but this text is not evidence for the late Vedic period. We must recognize how speculative is any argument about the social dynamics of the rise of kingship.

BUDDHISM AS A REMEDY IN AN AGE OF SUFFERING

These considerations collectively show the inconclusiveness of the discussion in the terms so far deployed. But, given the nature of the Buddhist message as one of ascetic renunciation for the sake of spiritual salvation outside society, it might seem appropriate to seek an explanation of the rise of Buddhism by abandoning all the positive arguments (to the effect that Buddhism was in tune with the new society) and maintaining only the negative ones (to the effect that it attracted the alienated).

The negative ones constitute an important undercurrent in modern perceptions of Buddhist teaching, often glibly labelled 'pessimism', if not even more misleadingly 'fatalism'. This is one strand of a broader argument focusing on the negative effects of dislocation and displacement, providing a ready audience for teachings like Buddhism, which reinforced and fed on this negativism. It is not uncharitable to assert that it stands or falls on the success with which we can demonstrate that pre-Buddhistic India was free of such tensions, as this view implies.

On the available evidence it is difficult to argue one way or the other. Kosambi has been the most eloquent and convincing exponent of this view, associating the success of Buddhism with the rise of individualism and with the collapse of community, by which he meant the collapse of the Vedic tribe. For example, in the political sphere this manifests itself in the rise of a more individualistic sort of society in kingdoms not founded on any older traditional loyalties, and the process of emergent individuality has economic consequences that can only aggravate the personal anxieties provoked by the reconfiguration of political power.⁵⁷

Kosambi's arguments link the collapse of the old tribal solidarity to the rise of religious movements feeding on the frustrations of displaced and dispossessed groups. They are persuasive arguments, but it is difficult to find evidence from the literature sufficiently transparent fully to confirm them. Moreover, the counter-argument also needs to be overturned if Kosambi's is to be accepted: all the available evidence portrays a fluid economy, one which is impressively diversified, and offering increasing opportunities to the enterprising. Whatever mental anxieties were created by the emergent attitudes of possessive individualism, and we do not know how widespread such attitudes were, these grew in generally favourable economic conditions.

⁵⁷ D. D. Kosambi, An Introduction to the Study of Ancient Indian History (Popular Book Depot, Bombay, 1956), pp. 156, 159. Cf. p. 167, 'truth, justice, non-stealing, not encroaching upon the possessions of others show that a totally new conception of private, individual property had arisen'.

Kosambi's argument would be all the more convincing if it could be shown that there were large numbers of displaced individuals and displaced groups, people who had suffered rapid decline in their living conditions. Whilst the Pāli texts do offer us some images of an idealized and frozen past (as exemplified in the ideal image of the brahmin of old), they offer us no images of groups who harbour a strongly nostalgic vision of a time when everything was better than it is now.⁵⁸ This does not mean such groups did not exist. Rather it simply confirms the canon to be primarily a religious document set within the particular historical context of its day; within this context the belief in secular decay figures purely as a general doctrinal formula. Buddhists accepted the myth of a decline into decay from a golden age, something akin to the Hindu yuga theory, but before we can draw conclusions from this we need to know why they told the story of decline in the first place. Such stories, which may be told in any age (not just ages of urban expansion), can be accommodated within the anthropology of religion as messages emphasizing the contrast between the sacred (however defined) and the profane.

However, one must not fall into the trap of defining ancient Indian culture in purely religious terms. The temptation to exaggerate the religious character of everything arises because our primary textual sources are almost exclusively religious. But there can be no natural presumption that disaffected urbanites unhappy with their conditions would be thereby disposed to join a religious movement requiring them to forsake their families and become wandering mendicants.

Further, it does not make sense to claim that people turned to a doctrine of withdrawal from a world full of suffering as a response to the fact that they were actually suffering more than in previous ages. This interpretation, attributing Buddhism's success to its pessimism, is in a way anachronistic. It supposes that people in the Buddha's time saw history from our own (modern) perspective, and made the sorts of comparisons which we might make, thereby recognizing that conditions were worse than in previous centuries and feeling unhappy as a result. We do not find texts drawing the conclusions we would expect – that historical decline is a cause of dukkha, that life in urban kingdoms is unhappy, and that therefore people should turn away from the world. The hypothesis simply does not fit comfortably with the evidence of what people believed.

⁵⁸ Except perhaps for the Aggañña Sutta, which presents a myth or parable of social and moral decline. See M. Carrithers, review of S. J. Tambiah, World Conqueror, World Renouncer, Journal of the Anthropological Society of Oxford, 8 (1977), pp. 95–105. Carrithers sees the sutta's use of the theory of successive stages of decline as a satire upon brāhmanical lore. Cf. S. Collins, 'The Discourse on What is Primary (Aggañña-Sutta). An annotated translation', Journal of Indian Philosophy, 21 (1993), pp. 301–95.

In fact, people can suffer from all manner of afflictions caused by war, oppression, inequality and malnutrition without necessarily comparing their lot with a past situation inferred from historical evidence or turning to creeds based upon the diagnosis that a modern historian might make.

Is it anyway proper to treat Buddhism as pessimistic? This may be justified to the extent that we can identify a pessimistic world view with the notion of dukkha, a concept which acquired an axiomatic status in Buddhist teaching. Dukkha is an untranslatable word connoting unsatisfactoriness, disillusionment, anxiety, physical pain and insecurity in every possible modulation and dimension. So the point of the doctrine may be found in a doctrinal, not a social, context: the doctrines of impermanence and non-self entail that human experience, based on the belief in a continuing self, should in all circumstances be shot through with frustration or unsatisfactoriness. On this view the concept arose from a philosophical tenet; it does not represent pessimism inspired by social disruption and alienation.

SIMULTANEOUS LEGITIMATION AND PROTEST

Some explanations of Buddhism's appeal favour the positive side (Buddhism legitimated and supported the new society), and some the negative (Buddhism attracted those alienated by the new society); there are also some who have argued on both sides.⁵⁹ The temptation to present arguments portraying Buddhism both as a sigh of the oppressed and as a legitimizing device to prop up the authority of tyrants has also affected anthropologists such as Marvin Harris. On one side:

The great universalistic religions can also best be understood as products of the misery the Old World imperial systems created in their futile attempt to relieve reproductive pressures by intensification, exploitation and warfare . . . Buddhism preached the overthrow of the hereditary priesthoods, declared poverty a virtue, outlawed the slaughter of vital plow animals, and converted the de facto vegetarianism of the semi-starved peasants into a spiritual blessing.⁶⁰

⁵⁹ Most notable in this respect is R. S. Sharma, Material Culture, pp. 123–6, who argues that Buddhism was in tune with urbanization because it permitted usury, eating houses, and prostitution, and rejected the old brahmanical ways such as animal sacrifices which could not be afforded in the new economic conditions. On the other hand it was a reaction against urbanization in its rejection of 'gross social inequalities' and values based on money, luxuries, or private property; it condemned the urban way of life with its inequality and suffering and the disintegration of the social order. See pp. 128–31.

⁶⁰ M. Harris, Cultural Materialism: the struggle for a science of culture (Random House, New York, 1979), p. 109.

On the other hand, it appears, Buddhism was a weapon of elite domination:

The demystification of the world religions begins with this simple fact: Confucianism, Taoism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Christianity and Islam prospered because the ruling elites who invented or co-opted them benefited materially from them.⁶¹

Generally, as here, the apparent inconsistency goes unacknowledged. Sometimes, though, scholars have pointed out explicitly that Buddhism seemed on their accounts to have played opposite parts; Uma Chakravarti refers to a 'dialectical relationship' between Buddhism and new socio-economic forces.⁶² Such a 'dialectical relationship', however, is not an explanation. How, in detail, could a single protagonist both oppose and unite with socio-economic changes? What, in fact, was this Buddhism?

There is nothing wrong with eclecticism if the author is presenting a coherent synthesis that orders and explains the various ways in which Buddhism could tap into different, even conflicting, aspirations. Such eclecticism is not self-evidently absurd; but it needs to be justified by a consistent account of the 'Buddhism' seen as a protagonist in cultural history. The problem we confront is that a coherent synthesis is generally lacking.

Other interpretations which seek to deal relatively comprehensively with the positive and negative aspects find similar difficulty in dealing with the gap between them.⁶³ A basic problem is that it is not at all easy to see how a thoroughly ascetic movement is likely to have gained real popularity or social relevance in the first place.

THE FALLACY OF TREATING EFFECTS AS CAUSES

The actual mechanism of Buddhism's likely appeal during its early years has not in fact been analysed with any finesse. We confront an issue in the logic of explanation. Whenever any movement M follows more or less closely ⁶¹ Ibid., p. 110.

⁶² Chakravarti, Social Dimensions, p. 64, 'It has been suggested that Buddhism had a dialectical relationship with the new system of production and the new society emerging . . . demonstrating simultaneously both an opposition to and unity with it.'

⁶³ There is no space here to discuss Weber's impressive attempt at a synthesis, but see G. Bailey, 'Max Weber's Hinduism and Buddhism: a new interpretation', and I. Mabbett, 'Weber, Protestantism and Buddhism', papers contributed to Max Weber, Religion and Social Action, conference in Canberra, September 1999. Gokhale, 'The Buddhist social Ideals', argues that Buddhism first appealed negatively, then changed its nature and appealed positively. It is not easy to see how an organization which so blatantly switched its policies could have subsequently succeeded so well after radically changing its character. Too much remains difficult to digest.

upon the operation of any process P, it is possible to identify those features of M which might be described as in harmony with P and declare that they 'explain' how M arose as a natural effect of P; it is also possible to identify those features which might be described as discordant or incompatible and declare that they 'explain' how M arose as a reaction against P. Sometimes, as with Buddhism, one can do both at once. Yet in no case is a real explanation thereby achieved. Any randomly chosen process and any randomly chosen movement may, if they are complex enough, render up to an appropriate investigation some features of harmony and some features of discordance. To identify the features is not ipso facto to discover any causal links. The claim that Buddhism was a legitimator of urbanization or a reaction against it is not an explanation.

When we look closely at the urbanization hypothesis, therefore, we can see how easily it might fall into the post hoc ergo propter hoc fallacy. During a certain period, the Gangetic plain witnessed the rise of cities. During a later but overlapping period, the dhamma became an important element in urban culture. The first is therefore used to explain the second.

There is a simple process by which this manner of explanation is made to seem plausible, and the outline of causal connections is blurred:

- 1 Buddhism in its original conception, and brahmanism in its earlier form before the rise of cities and kingdoms, had distinctive characteristics which were not congruent with the processes of urbanization and state formation.
- 2 Both Buddhism and brahmanism, in different ways, came to terms with the rise of cities and kingdoms, adapting to changing society and themselves changing in the process. At the latter end of any process of adaptation, an institution becomes more or less integrated into, and comes to serve the purposes of, the social structure in which it is lodged.
- 3 Thus, in different ways, Buddhism and brahmanism acquired characteristics that were wholly congruent with the culture of the city-based regional kingdom, with distinct roles to play in this culture.

In the case of Buddhism, these characteristics were grafted upon the traditions that eventually found written form, and thus come to be available as explanatory principles – they are assumed to have been characteristics of original Buddhism, making it easy to see how the teaching must by its nature have appealed to the citizens of the urbanizing societies, filling an ideological gap. The result of Buddhism's popularity is treated as its cause. Meanwhile, the traces of a much earlier and quite different sort of teaching (surviving awkwardly alongside the results of adaptation) were available to explain how people reacting against urbanization took to something quite different. These considerations are important if we are to see how delusive is 'urbanization' as a ready-made 'explanation'. What looks like a cause of Buddhism's appeal might well be its effect.

Where the question of historical causes and effects is in view, it is impossible to ignore Max Weber, often called the father of modern sociology. To be sure, his research on Indian religion is now, in detail, superseded; but his ideas remain influential, and his insights still have something to offer. There is no space here to deal with them properly, but we need to notice where he stands on the explanation of the rise of Indian Buddhism.

We noticed above his alignment of Buddhism with 'urban development, of urban kingship and the city nobles'.⁶⁴ This seems to place him with the proponents of the 'positive' argument, the view that Buddhism became popular because of its aptness to express the urban ethos, but in fact the central intent of The Religion of India, the work most often cited in English to identify Weber's views on the matter, is to advance an interpretation of Indian religion, Hinduism as well as Buddhism and others, as essentially other-worldly, world-fleeing.

To be sure, as Ilana Silber has observed, Weber's focus is on withdrawal from the world in a general sense, without detailed attention to 'the more radically individual and/or withdrawn eremitic forms of virtuosity'⁶⁵ (which indeed will be given importance in the present study). There is no doubt, however, that for him the Indian religions take their place in the grand scheme of the history of religions in the category of world-denial. The grand scheme in question is not one that can be fully understood by taking in isolation any one of the well-known essays translated separately into English. It is one which evolved throughout his oeuvre, and it finishes by proposing that, in general, human culture is governed by all manner of factors, material and social as well as religious, but that at certain crucial points societies take decisive turns towards one or another of a limited number of cosmological belief systems, and once such a turn has been taken, certain possible futures are closed off. India, for Weber, took a turn towards the ideology of world-denial, and this foreclosed the possibility of subsequent progress towards rational, this-worldly and (in Weber's own special sense) 'ascetic' culture.⁶⁶

⁶⁴ Weber, The Religion of India, p. 204.

⁶⁵ I. Friedrich-Silber, Virtuosity, Charisma, and Social Order: a comparative sociological study of monasticism in Theravada Buddhism and medieval Catholicism (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995), p. 33.

This is a sort of modified determinism of ideas, however qualified. It will not be adopted here, but it is important to follow Weber in recognizing the complexity of the causal factors that are in play, and to assess the social role of a religion carefully in relation to its material and social context. The following chapters are addressed to this context.

⁶⁶ See particularly F. H. Tenbruch, 'The problem of thematic unity in the works of Max Weber', British Journal of Sociology, 31/3 (1980), pp. 315–51.

Context

The social elite

In order to define properly the mediatory role of the monk it is necessary to review the evidence concerning the structure of society in the period with which this book is concerned. It is not our intention to present in exhaustive detail all information in the texts pertaining to social classes, occupational positions, kinship terminology and varṇa affiliation, though some of this will be mentioned. These have been well treated in other publications and any extended treatment here would simply duplicate them.¹ Rather, the emphasis in this chapter will be focused on three areas: (1) a summary of the principal characteristics of the various elite groups as they receive more emphasis in the texts than any other groups; (2) a description of the concurrent operation of various forms of classification which operate within similar groups that otherwise might be different; and (3) the difficulties in determining whether a demonstrably pluralist society needs a universal ideology to provide it with the possibility of political and social homogeneity. Put in another way, the question we have set ourselves in this chapter is to ask whether the many groups and social units mentioned in the Pāli Canon (and tribal names found in late Vedic literature) reflected a society, highly diverse in a number of ways, such that we need to speak of semi-autonomous groups and even of distinct small-scale societies existing side by side. Or do we have to argue a case that the texts present us with a veneer of diversity, underneath which there is really a tendency towards socialization and uniformity along the lines of the brāhmanical varṇa model?

Society is never monolithic. Textual and archaeological evidence suggests ancient Buddhist and Hindu literature was informed by both small and large-scale societies. These must have included tribal-based rural societies, city-based societies, rural communities probably centred on villages and, because of the importance of the various ascetic movements, many highly visible individuals wandering from urban centre to countryside and back again. Within this essentially spatial and social configuration of people, different possibilities of personal identity and social interaction were being developed. These ranged from forms of possessive individualism to group-based forms of identity where the group severely restricted the limits available to wholly individualized behaviour. More likely, in an empirical sense, such views existed side by side and offered possibilities of identity rather than clearly delineated pathways of social behaviour.

¹ See N. K. Wagle, Society at the Time of the Buddha (Popular Prakashan, Bombay, 1966); Chakravarti, Social Dimensions.

There are two approaches we can adopt in exploring through Buddhist sources what is in reality pre-caste society. We can study the society itself, apart from Buddhism, simply using the Buddhist sources as a window upon it; or we can try to understand it by looking at the relations between Buddhist monks and nuns and the rest of society. In adopting the first, it is important to recognize that the society described in Buddhist texts should not be thought of as something unique to Buddhism. We are not looking at two different societies when using Hindu and Buddhist sources, but one society, certainly not monolithic in any sense. There was substantial cultural and social diversity in ancient India just as there is now. Widespread mining of the Buddhist texts has tended to reinforce an assumption that in using those sources we are dealing with some entity called a Buddhist society. Such a thing may exist in the case of certain Theravāda Buddhist countries in present-day South East Asia and including Sri Lanka, but it could never have been the case in ancient India.

This view needs more nuancing. It is not so much that we find these ideas being explicitly developed in the secondary sources. Rather, there is an implication that a Buddhist society could possibly be realized. The Sigālovādasutta presents the outlines of a social ethic, as does the Vinaya everywhere, but this is not the presentation of a society. It is the presentation of a set of standards for action, strongly coloured by a Buddhist ethical view, designed to produce a particular result conducive to medium- and long-term success and contentment in every aspect of life.

The second approach, on the other hand, demands that we do not ignore the interrelation between monk, nun, saṅgha and society. In the Vinaya, the Majjhima and Dīgha Nikāyas, the conditions for these interrelations are laid down prescriptively and explored in some detail in narrative form to illustrate how they might apply in given historical situations. Much of what we find in the Pāli Canon dealing with subjects of a social nature is included expressly to illustrate these interrelations, and it is from this specific perspective that the social material in the Canon must be read.

These, then, are the two ways of approaching the study of pre-caste society: examining the Buddhist texts (among other sources) as a window upon it, and examining it through the interaction between Buddhists and others. A failure fully to appreciate these alternatives may lead to the fallacious conclusion that whatever picture of society scholars see in the literature was strongly coloured by Buddhism in all of its doctrinal and behavioural permutations. In the present chapter our focus is primarily on the first of these alternatives, even if, and this is a crucial condition, we can only glimpse social conditions using the second alternative as the vehicle. To put this in other words: we envision ancient Indian society as it is depicted in Buddhist texts mostly by extrapolating from social conditions encountered in contacts of monks and nuns with laypeople, many of whom would not have been lay Buddhists. We deal with the second alternative more fully in the second section of this book.

It should, finally, be noted that the material in this and the next chapter has been placed into conceptual abstractions that likely meant very little in this form to the agents of the actions the texts describe. That is, in order to create some control over our data we have been required to use categories, taken largely from the social sciences, that abstract material in such a way as to present a more simplistic picture than would really have existed. It is our hope that the use of such categories as 'economy' or 'urbanization' will be found to have illuminated the sources rather than to have obscured them.

CATEGORIZATION OF SOCIAL GROUPS IN BUDDHIST LITERATURE: SOCIAL DIVERSITY

Any wide reading of the earliest texts relating to the period covered in this book demonstrates that the articulation of society did not lend itself to any simple scheme of division into stable classes or what later became castes; it consisted rather of a patchwork of miscellaneous groups, each united by a sense of kin, either authentic or constructed, or by whatever other factors, especially occupational, tribal or political, gave it functional unity. The overwhelming impression given by literary sources is that, however powerful a king might be, his power rested upon his success in manipulating the relationships between innumerable local groupings, defined in various ways, which in the normal course of things conducted their affairs more or less autonomously. Members of each such group were likely to cluster together for mutual support in a dangerous world. What we observe is that there was a variety of such groups – lineage groups, extended families or clans, merchant or craft organizations, gaṇa communities, unassimilated tribes on the borders, and so forth. A convenient general term for these groups is vargas, separate groups; in law such communities were recognized by the time of the Kātyāyanasmṛti as contracting parties to agreements made between local communities for specific purposes.² The task for the social historian is to determine whether there is any substance behind these names and to what extent social cohesion was maintained only within the group or between the individual groups when they came into contact with emerging large-scale societies.

The existence of many such groups, and many of them are just names, beyond which we know nothing, may give the impression that we are dealing with a highly complex society with many different status levels and political, religious and economic networks. However, it is our view that whilst there may have been individuals in the society where the Buddha lived who perceived society in a broader manner than whatever existed in a set of individual villages and towns – after all the varṇa theory is a theory of society – it is better to distinguish between small-scale and large-scale societies. In this sense much of what the Buddhist texts tell us applies at the level of small-scale societies, though it is clear that, at least on the level of the expanding monarchies, large-scale societies were developing. Roughly speaking, then, a total account of the society reflected in this literature makes sense only when we consider it operating as a set of mini-societies, where the rough distinction is between complex urban societies and small-scale rural and forest groups, where the socio-economic structure is necessarily simpler than the former though interpersonal relationships could be equally complex.

Canonical and later sources alike furnish evidence of a large number of groups which made up the kind of small-scale social structure that would characterize a village. They were not, as Rhys Davids pointed out long ago, like castes as later known, and they included numbers of named occupational or tribal communities on the fringes of brāhmaṇical society, such as the Caṇḍālas, Nesādas, Veṇas, Rathakāras, and Pukkusas. A text dealing with these groups is repeated almost verbatim several times in the Canon:

There are degraded families: a caṇḍāla family, a family of hunters, of bamboo workers, of chariot-makers and of refuse-removers. A person is born in such a family which is poor, one in which food, drink and possessions are few, in which the lifestyle is difficult, in which animal fodder and covering are gained with difficulty. And he is of poor complexion, ugly, dwarf-like, frequently sick, or else

² Kātyāyanasmṛti 225, 349, 682.

he is blind, or deformed, or lame, or a cripple; nor does he possess food, drink, clothing, vehicle, garlands, scents and ointment, nor a bed, a dwelling and a lamp plus things to light it with.³

There is a triune implication in dealing with these groups. They are simultaneously occupational, low status and marginalized, the latter two probably because they are tribal. Note that the standards of classification here are possession or otherwise of material wealth, method of occupation – the implication being that all these names, except for rathākara, indicate unskilled occupations – and location, all of them being forest dwellers. Beyond this they are all of bad appearance and sickly – judgements expressive of prejudice. They are poor but not beggars. One reason for this almost wholly negative evaluation is that they are reborn into their position through bad karma (S II 85–6). Yet we must assume these figures were not picked out of a vacuum, that they were regarded within the culture, undifferentiated between Hindus and Buddhists, as being of low occupational status, relatively speaking, and of marginal value.

Two passages containing this list also present its opposite, a man who is born in a high family:

In such a case a particular person is reborn in a high family, a wealthy warrior family, or a wealthy priestly family or a wealthy householder family, which is opulent, has much grain, much wealth, abundant gold and silver, abundant possessions and means, abundant wealth and good fortune. In addition, he is handsome, good looking, pleasant, has an exquisite lotus-like complexion, possesses food, drink, clothes, a vehicle, garlands, scents and ointments, a bed, clothes and a lamp plus things to light it with.⁴

In every way this is the opposite of what is described as being characteristic of the incumbent of the low occupation. Wealth is once again a categorical feature and this is combined with vaṇṇa and what is essentially an agrarian elite (gahapati) category, thus reflecting a triune classification. Note this group is in no sense marginalized, being rather the accepted elite of the society described in the Pāli Canon.

If there is a difference between these two groups, it is that the low occupational types are marginalized and probably tribal groups, unlike the elite categories which were forming one of the central elements in the emerging large-scale societies. The difficulty of distinguishing between a tribal group (with its own inherited way of life, language, kinship system and religious tradition) and what later becomes a caste (with its endogamous structure, prescribed occupation and distinctive rituals) can be very hard to draw. As A. Bêteille says, 'Tribes have existed at the margins of Hindu civilization from time immemorial, and these margins have always been vague, uncertain and fluctuating.'⁵ Aśoka refers in an inscription to the forest dwellers, the rough untamed people who belong to the wilds on the borderlands and follow a different way of life;⁶ they must be dealt with circumspectly, for their loyalty is always uncertain. The Arthaśāstra refers at many points to the same forest tribes, aṭavika, as potential antagonists who must be controlled by cunning.⁷ We also cite in this connection Śāṅkhalikhitadharmaśūtra 7:

³ M III 169–70; S I 93–4; A I 107, II 85–6; Vin IV 6. (See also PTS Dictionary, s.v. caṇḍāla, on the 'low castes', nīcā kulā. Note that Vin IV 6 has jāti (possibly suggestive of lineage instead of family) instead of kula, hīna instead of nīca, and ukkaṭṭha instead of ucca. From the Brāhmaṇas see the very comprehensive list of names given in Egon Brucker, Die Spätvedische Kulturperiode nach den Quellen der Śrauta-, Gṛhya und Dharmasūtras. Der Siedlungsraum (Steiner, Wiesbaden, 1980), pp. 85–7.

⁴ S II 94–5.

The ārya land is excellent and lies to the east of the sunset and to the west of the sunrise, and runs as far as the high mountains reach and as far as the sacred rivers flow . . . To the east of Sindhu-Sauvīra, south of Himālaya, west of Kāmpilī and north of Pāriyātra the brahman splendour is impeccable. The traditions of all the rules of life of castes and families of other lands are different from this.⁸

Here the classification turns on ritual purity and impurity, where the standard of the former is the brahmin, and denotes Āryāvarta as that area between the Gaṅgā and Yamunā rivers valley in contrast to everything outside of it.

These mini-societies had a variety of forms. There were craft villages, where trades were passed on from father to son. Villages of caṇḍālas, a despised group, are also mentioned.⁹ It is unclear whether this specific term relates to a group permanently polluted by occupation or derives its status from other factors. Jātakas speak of a village of 500 robbers, and elsewhere we learn that forest guards belonging to guild-type organizations would escort travellers in the forest areas.¹⁰ Such communities ran their own affairs. Heads (settha) of clans (kula) were responsible for peace and stability; one sutta attributes the cosmic decline of the age to crimes and lack ⁵ A. Bêteille, 'On the concept of tribe', International Social Science Journal, 32 (1980), pp. 825–8, at p. 827.

⁶ Rock Edict 13, M; see Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum, Vol. 1 Inscriptions of Asoka, new edn ed. E. Hultzsch (Indological Book House, Delhi and Varanasi, 1969), pp. 67 and 69 n. 3: Devānāmpriya even pacifies the aṭavi; see also C. Caillat, 'Aśoka et les gens de la brousse (XIII M-N)', Bulletin des Etudes Indiennes, 9 (1991), pp. 9–13, at p. 9. Also H. Kulke, Jagannātha-Kult und Gajapati-Königtum (Steiner, Wiesbaden, 1979), pp. 6–7.

⁷ See for example AS 9.2, advising a king on conditions in which to recruit aṭavikas into his own army.

⁸ Text cited in Brückner, Spätvedische Kulturpoche, p. 95. ⁹ JIV 390.

¹⁰ JIV 430; R. Fick, Die Soziale Gliederung in Nordöstlichen Indien zu Buddhas Zeit (Kiel, 1897), pp. 176f.

of respect for parents and kulaseththa.¹¹ Communities called kula, literally 'family', appear to be equivalent to jāti ('birth'), the later common term for the local caste group.¹² In at least certain cases, communities such as guilds, a kind of economic grouping, had their own regular courts for the trying of offences; in the Majjhima Nikāya for example we find reference to different types of court including guild courts along with the royal family court and others.¹³ We cannot know, however, whether these refer to different kinds of villages or to different forms of assembly and judicial bodies within a single village or town, suggesting a large-scale society.

The economic imperative as a basis of classification is very important in Buddhist literature, and not just because it was easy to recognize, but also because it accurately reflected the situation in the area the early Buddhists inhabited. Examples such as these cited below are reflective of this mode of generalization.

If a ksatriya were to prosper in wealth or corn or gold or silver, he could have another ksatriya to get up earlier than he would, to go to bed later, doing what pleases him and speaking affably, or he could have a brahmin . . . vaiśya . . . śūdra . . . [to do the same. Similarly a brahmin, vaiśya and śūdra could have any of the four classes to serve him.]¹⁴ Brahmins hold that a brahmin, ksatriya, vaiśya or śūdra may serve a brahmin; that a ksatriya, vaiśya or śūdra may serve a ksatriya; that a vaiśya or śūdra may serve a vaiśya; and that only a śūdra may serve a śūdra.¹⁵

If a ksatriya . . . brahmin . . . vaiśya . . . śūdra were to engage in house-breaking, or carry off plunder, or rob an isolated house, or wait in ambush, or commit adultery, the king would kill him or ruin him or banish him or deal with him as he liked, for the designation of ksatriya . . . brahmin . . . vaiśya . . . śūdra would be irrelevant for him and he would be reckoned simply as a robber.¹⁶

There are several contexts in which this mode of categorization would have made sense to the authors of the text. At the most basic it is simply a difference between rich and poor and directly implies that other forms of categorization will be overtaken by wealth, a standard which overturns other forms of classification. Such passages also contain traces of an acceptance that economic considerations could theoretically determine social relationships. These passages do not vitiate the relevance of the varṇa system because a brahmin remains such even if he works for any of the three lower varṇas. The problem then becomes not that there exists a hierarchy, but of the possibility of moving between levels, especially where they are defined in classificatory systems different from the varṇas.

¹¹ D III 70. ¹² Wagle, Society, p. 122. Cf. n. 3 above.

¹⁴ Summary of M II 84. ¹⁵ Summary of M II 177–8.

¹³ MI 288; cf. M III 48.

¹⁶ Summary of M II 87–8.

Uma Chakravarti, in some measure following Romila Thapar, argues that Buddhist society was ideally conceptualized in terms of 'khattiya, brāhmaṇa, and gahapati representing categories in the social world, and the samaṇa or recluse representing the asocial world'.¹⁷ In fact, the texts tell us the samaṇa was very active in the social world even if the ideology shaping that role evaluated the social in a quite different way from the other categories mentioned here, turning above all on the image of the samaṇa as an isolated figure. Leaving aside the samaṇa, the other three who are said to represent categories in the social world cross two classificatory systems. Brāhmaṇa and khattiya are the highest two rungs of the varṇa system, no doubt a brāhmaṇical invention, but probably recognized by all groups in the society, irrespective of their adherence to Hindu beliefs and practices. It is possible, occupationally speaking, that the gahapati should be taken to represent the vaiśya class, though the Pāli texts frequently mention compounds joining brāhmaṇa and khattiya with gahapati as the final member. It is more likely that these three names represent the elite in the social world depicted in the Buddhist texts, and that individuals could easily operate within several different classifications found within the same locality, though probably these classifications would have had to be derived from different areas of culture. That is, a man could not be both brāhmaṇa and vaiśya, though he could be brāhmaṇa, a wealthy landholder and perhaps a member of a guild as well. This is the least we would expect in the highly pluralistic society which marked the urban areas of the Buddha's time and the succeeding centuries, though less so the rural villages and their surrounding lands and scarcely at all the tribal groups. What this means is that it is likely the urban areas show the highest degree of diversity in social classification and frames of social classification, though they need not have cohered less as social groups than more isolated and localized communities.

ELITE GROUPS AND THE BASIS OF ELITE STATUS

An investigation of the status of elites in and around the rise of Buddhism falls firmly within the second of our assumptions about Buddhism and society – where we opt for a concentration on the relationships between Buddhists (monks) and the rest of society – suggested at the beginning of this chapter. Whom are we entitled to identify as elites in the societies of the time this book covers? In both Hindu and Buddhist sources brāhmaṇas and ḷṣatriyas emerge as social, cultural and political elites. If we rely mainly on Buddhist sources it is necessary to add the gahapati, the setthi and the rājan, all of whom are mentioned in the passage from the Kūṭadantasutta cited below (p. 48). It would be immensely helpful if we knew what percentage of the total population was constituted by these groups and details of the various levels of difference within the elite itself. Scholarship has traditionally suggested that of these elites, the gahapatis and setthis were newly emergent, brāhmaṇas were raising an already high status, and ṣṭriyas and rājans were struggling to determine their status in emerging societies where a single ruler reigned and the others became mere soldiers and, perhaps, absentee landlords.

¹⁷ Chakravarti, Social Dimensions, p. 67.

It is necessary to say something about the meaning of the word 'elite' in the context of early Buddhist literature. Most of the secondary literature dealing with ancient Indian society uses notions of an 'elite' or 'elite status' implicitly, without defining in any precise sense what is meant by either term. Gokhale, in a much cited article, defines the Buddhist elite using two criteria:

In the first instance the person's intellectual, spiritual attainments and/or organizational skills would be the most obvious qualifications for his inclusion among the elite. Such is the case with Sāriputta and Moggallāna, Ānanda . . . The other is the attribution of an elite status to the person either by the Buddha himself or some of his eminent disciples or the redactors of the Pāli Canon who thought it fit to include information on them or their utterances in parts of the Pāli Canon.¹⁸

This is scarcely adequate as an evaluation of elite status as it includes only the saṅgha. This in itself makes it too narrow to encompass elite groups in the wider society. A more recent book by Murray Milner¹⁹ argues that elite status is primarily constructed in terms of economic, political and religious categories, each of which either works to confer some kind of intellectual legitimacy on the elites amongst the larger body of non-elites or provides channels whereby the means of production can be controlled and distributed. Both are necessarily interrelated. Whilst this may not seem a spectacular insight, it does provide a frame for discussion of particular kinds of social groupings where otherwise this might not have been available.

The social categories pertaining to the religious, political and economic spheres, even if they overlap constantly, strike us continually when reading the early Buddhist texts. Reflections on the interactions between representatives of the groups defined within these categories and monks form a large part of the content of this book. Statistical analysis of the vaṇṇa ranking status of all the named individuals, populating the Sutta and Vinaya Piṭakas, carried out by Sarao, Chakravarti, Ray and Gokhale respectively, suggests that the Buddha interacts mostly with members of three particular groups: brahmins, prominent politicians (i.e., kings) and the wealthy. We cannot be certain how much he interacted with other groups, even though the lower ranking groups would have formed the majority of the society. Here too, once more, the texts are limiting in their focus on the Buddha himself, who originally came from a noble background. Would the picture be different if we had more information about the interaction of other monks with lay Buddhists and the rest of the non-Buddhist population?

¹⁸ B. G. Gokhale, 'The early Buddhist elite', Journal of Indian History, 42 (1965), p. 392.

¹⁹ Murray Milner, Status and Sacredness. A General Theory of Status Relations and an Analysis of Indian Culture (Oxford University Press, New York, 1994), pp. 65–79.

If we were to rely on the perspective taken in the indigenous literature we would find a focus on brāhmanical categories, especially varṇa and jāti, both of which take up religious as well as occupational characteristics, or concentrate on the emerging figure of the gahapati as a means of tying elite status into processes of economic change. Certain texts, such as the following from the Kūṭadantasutta, conflate the two main sources of elite status, varṇa classification and economic wealth. The passage in question concerns a king who wishes to perform a sacrifice. His purohita tells him to invite the following groups, all of whom are qualified as living either in the town or the country: ksatriyas who are vassals of the king; ministers who sit in his assembly; wealthy brahmins and wealthy householders.²⁰ Whilst there is nothing particularly exceptional about this passage, it does, we believe, define the socio-economic constituents of a kingdom whose influence the king may have found necessary for his support. In this case he harnesses support by reaffirming his kingship through performance of a śrauta sacrifice, the presence of certain groups to witness the display being necessary as a demonstration of his qualification to be king.

Where the text becomes interesting and germane to the present argument is in its rehearsal of some of the qualifications of the participants. Of the king eight qualities are listed: his lineage was well born on both sides, he was physically imposing and handsome, he was fabulously wealthy in property, precious metals and grain, he had a powerful army and was a mighty warrior, he was generous and a supporter of beggars and mendicants, he was learned, he could analyse sayings, and, finally, he was intelligent and could predict the future. The text goes on to tell us about the four qualities of the brahmin, which set him apart from others. He too is well born on both sides back to seven generations, he knew the entire field of Vedic knowledge, he was virtuous and skilled in performing the sacrifice.²¹

²⁰ DI 136 and often. See below, ch. 11.

This text is more informative about the king than it is about the brahmins or any of the other elite classes. It compiles a list of qualities affirming elite status within the frame of the characteristics assigned to the first three varṇas, following the manner in which these are formally listed in the dharmasāstras, and by measure of wealth. Thus the king, as a metaphor for the kingdom in its entirety, brings within his person all the cultural, economic, military and religious factors necessary for the kingdom to survive and prosper. This is scarcely an original vision but it has the virtue of presenting elite status as a combination of wealth, lineage, physical power and knowledge. The king is perhaps unique in possessing all of these in his own person. Not so for the other classes. For it is clear from this description and others elsewhere that the brahmin held, relatively speaking, elite status because of his possession of religious knowledge and the capacity to transmit it. He may also have held monetary wealth and/or land, but his status was independent of this.

That we have so much information on groups who could justifiably claim elite status is a problem in itself. It gives us a highly skewed view of the society of the time. It is almost certain that those who composed the text were literate – if writing was being practised at the time when Buddhism began –, thus placing themselves amongst the educated elite. Their treatment of the lower socio-economic groups is, therefore, minimal and makes it extremely difficult for scholars to penetrate the veil created in the texts.

Gahapatis were heads of some of the smaller units in the kaleidoscope of semi-autonomous social units. Fick considered that in some respects the class of gahapati could be compared to caste groups, with a real sense of status as members of a high class, but without the community customs or judicial powers which he regarded as essential to the definition of a caste.²² Sometimes they are enumerated as a class alongside (and thus not overlapping with) brahmins and ṣṣatriyas, but at other times there is an overlap and the term gahapati is a label for the social eminence of pillars of the community including brahmins.²³ Brahmins are included in the class, in the case of brahmin villages.²⁴ Thapar has related the gahapatis to the rise of the new kingdoms based on agrarian societies in the northeast after the ²¹ D I 139. ²² Fick, Soziale Gliederung, p. 165.

²³ R. Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins in the early Buddhist period', The Memoirs of the Toyo Bunko, 49 (1991), pp. 57–60.

²⁴ Wagle, Society, pp. 18f.; cf. pp. 151–6.

Vedic period, describing them as representing a distinct stage in economic evolution – a stage in which economic management was fragmented.²⁵

The brāhmaṇa-gaḥapati has an ambiguous status in early Buddhist texts. On the one hand, he seems ideologically and actually to be the opposite of everything for which the bhikkhu stands. As such he is presented almost as an ideal type even if we can glimpse many cracks beneath the surface in looking at this type. He was not a homogeneous figure on the measure of occupation and wealth, even if representations of him are collected into a single symbol which can be used to contrast him with the bhikkhu, and this may well have been the function of this symbol in the context of the early texts. On the other hand, he was a source of material support for the saṅgha and its principal source of recruitment. Both monk and brāhmaṇa-gaḥapati were mirrors each of what the other one was not.

If the gaḥapati was anything in early Buddhist literature it was an overlapping social (householder = the male head of the family) and economic (landowner) category and was flexible enough to be attached to some of the varṇa titles. He worked on the land himself, supported a family group including servants, gave gifts to religious organizations and worked to extend the use of arable land. A passage like this taken from the Majjhima Nikāya illustrates the gaḥapati's overwhelming connection with material wealth:

And it is like a householder or his son, rich, of great wealth, of great possessions, with a mass of abundant gold ornaments, a mass of abundant corn, a mass of abundant fields, with a mass of abundant raiment, with a mass of abundant wives, with a mass of abundant men slaves, with a mass of abundant women slaves.²⁶

But his wealth is not just in money and land. It is also resides in his capacity to mobilize human resources as an employer and to demonstrate status by possession of multiple wives.

We prefer to identify the various groups who include gaḥapati in their name as being representative of a horizontal form of social classification in contrast to the vertical form of distinction based primarily on lineage or varṇa and focused on by Thapar in two recent studies.²⁷ Disputes over lineage and succession dominate the two Sanskrit epics, but appear to be of little importance in early Buddhist literature except where a criticism is made of the succession of seven generations used by brāhmaṇas to legitimize their claim to a higher status than other groups in society. What we note is a picture of a society focused on householders who showed a preference for agriculture and rural life rather than residence in those areas unambiguously urban in character. The gabapati is the foundational economic position in the transformed agrarian economy centred on all of the rural areas now supplying the cities and other developing conurbations. This position makes sense only in relation to the urban areas even if it is economically centred in the agrarian areas. Whatever his spatial location, he could not have remained untouched by the process of urbanism.

²⁵ Thapar, From Lineage to State, pp. 41f. ²⁶ MI 452.

²⁷ Thapar, 'The First Millennium' and From Lineage to State.

Finally, we note an important point made by Milner about the nature of the dispute that often characterizes the interrelations of economic elites:

In the realm of material production, a cleavage often arises between economic elites who control alternative means of production. Typically, this involves a conflict between ascendant means of production and more traditional ones. In agrarian societies, those who control and manage land are threatened by those who specialize in more movable forms of resources, for example merchants, traders and bankers.²⁸

This could easily be a description of the economic base of what were becoming large-scale societies in northeastern India during the time the Buddha flourished. What is certain is that both groups of economic elites were present, yet it cannot be confirmed whether the one (the agrarian elite) was regarded as being traditional, the other not. Of course, the basic thesis of much recent scholarship is that the early growth of Buddhism benefited substantially from the development of a mercantilist attitude in society and from the appearance of a group of people who could be generally called traders and financiers, even if this is not the exact translation of the term setthi. Even if these people made money through dealing in goods or financial services, they may still have owned parcels of agricultural land. It is more accurate to say that the gabapati were the village and country elite, whereas the setthi formed the urban elite, with the king, high members of the army, and any bureaucracy.

SOCIAL COHESION, VALUES AND ELITES

The texts do contain clues about what the up-and-coming aspirants to wealth were doing, those who seemed so eager to sustain the Buddha with the things of life the saṅgha itself could not produce by dint of its essential calling to inactivity. It is these groups of people who were the economic and political elite and who were enjoying the fruits of the rapidly expanding economy and its emergence into some kind of complex intra-regional entity. Some of the Buddha's activity was concerned with attracting a portion of the new wealth being created by the new elites and with positioning himself and his followers in the cultural mainstream without, for all that, compromising the originality of his own theoretical position. This would explain why the Buddha was supportive of a work effort focused upon self-help and why he was so inimical towards status based on birth, for him a sure cause of indolence, corruption and arrogance. And this, as has been frequently observed by scholars, was consistent with the kind of ideology the new economic elites in society would have needed in order to have retained whatever privilege they had acquired through their wealth.

²⁸ Milner, Status and Sacredness, p. 66.

There is certainly evidence of the Buddha taking up with real gusto the task of providing appropriate ethics for the new 'secular' elite classes. That he was successful in it – judging from the continuous stream of lay followers he attracted – is a testimony both to his own marketing skills and to the deep need in the people to have their desire for upward mobility legitimated. A brilliant instance of his teaching technique and the content of his thoughts in this area is given in a passage from the Mahāvagga,²⁹ which we cite at length. On one of his journeys the Buddha had reached Pāṭaligāma with 1,250 monks. Some laypeople came and offered the use of a rest house and provided lamps and washing facilities. In the morning (it is not clear if the Buddha had spent the night there) the Buddha went to the rest house which was filled up with monks and laypeople. Then he made a speech to all of them:

‘There are these five disadvantages, householders, for a person of poor morality who fails in morality. What five? Now, householders, a person of poor morality who fails in morality suffers great diminution of wealth owing to laziness; this is the first disadvantage for a person of poor morality who fails in morality.

Then again, householders, an evil reputation of a person of poor morality who fails in morality is spread abroad; this is the second disadvantage for a person of poor morality who fails in morality.

Then again, householders, when a person of poor morality who fails in morality approaches any company, whether it be a company of nobles, a company of brahmins, a company of householders or a company of recluses, he approaches it diffidently, being ashamed: this is the third disadvantage for a person of poor morality who fails in morality.

Then again, householders, a person of poor morality who fails in morality dies entirely confused; this is the fourth disadvantage for a person of poor morality who fails in morality.

Then again, householders, at the breaking up of the body after dying, a person of poor morality who fails in morality arises in the hell of loss, the realm of misery, ²⁹ Vin I 226ff.

the hell of ruin, hell;³⁰ this is the fifth disadvantage for a person of poor morality who fails in morality. These, householders, are the five disadvantages for a person of poor morality who fails in morality.

There are these five advantages, householders, for a moral person who cultivates morality. What five? Now, householders, a moral person who cultivates morality acquires a great mass of wealth due to his conscientiousness; this is the first advantage for a moral person who cultivates morality.

Then again, householders, for a moral person who cultivates morality an excellent reputation is spread abroad; this is the second advantage for a moral person who cultivates morality.

Then again, householders, when a moral person who cultivates morality approaches any company, whether a company of nobles, a company of brahmins, a company of householders or a company of recluses, he approaches it confidently, not being ashamed; this is the third advantage for a moral person who cultivates morality.

Then again, householders, a moral person who cultivates morality passes away entirely unconfused; this is the fourth advantage for a moral person who cultivates morality.

Then again, householders, at the breaking up of the body after dying a moral person who cultivates morality arises in the happy heaven, in heaven; this is the fifth advantage for a moral person who cultivates morality. These, householders, are the five advantages for a moral person who cultivates morality.'

When the Lord had gladdened, rejoiced, roused, delighted the laypeople of Pāṭaligāma far into the night with talk on dhamma, he dismissed them saying: 'The night has now almost passed, householders; now do whatever is timely.'

The set of five precepts announced by the Buddha in this lecture recur elsewhere³¹ in the canon, though only the version found in the Mahāparinibbānasutta includes the narrative context given here. All the others contain only the barest summary of the five disasters arising from immoral behaviour and the five advantages (ānisaṃso) accruing to the moral man. They offer no context for the oral delivery given by the Buddha.

This passage is highly significant for the kinds of qualities it groups together as constituting both positive and negative images of a man in the society of the time. Of course, the man envisaged here is not a monk but a layman and by implication a gahapati or a setthi who has accumulated wealth or sees this as one of his principal goals in life. Whatever his exact status, it is assumed he falls into that class of person we recognize, following the texts, as constituting the new elite. What the Buddha proposes the layman should cultivate is material wealth, good reputation, confidence, self-knowledge and a good rebirth of the kind a layman would have expected. Translating this into concepts familiar in the West today, we would argue that the Buddha is promoting a modest 'get rich' scheme, a scheme proposing self-confidence, self-assertiveness and self-knowledge (in the sense of goal-setting) and negotiating skills that will facilitate advancement in all spheres – except that of the monk, deliberately excluded here – in which the layman may find himself. So complete is this self-help programme that it even makes allowance for the acquisition of good merit leading to a desirable rebirth after death, a prospect never considered by hawkers of self-development schemes in the contemporary West. The parallel can only be stretched a certain distance, beyond which its validity fails. What the Buddha taught in the discourse cited above was only a small part of his overall teaching, though it does sum up admirably his conception of the normative role for the layperson in society, the rest of the teaching being of such sophistication as to exclude all but the most well-educated monk and the occasional layperson (as evidence from contemporary Buddhist countries indicates). One further example comes from a list in the *Aṅguttara Nikāya*³² where five reasons for a person to become rich are enumerated. Wealth (1) makes himself and others happy, (2) makes his friends and companions happy, (3) allows him to ward off danger from water and fire, from rājas, robbers, enemies and heirs, (4) allows him to make the five oblations to deceased ancestors and so on, and (5) allows him to perform offerings that will take him to heaven.

³⁰ apāyam duggatiṃ vinipātaṃ nirayam. Each of these words refers to a particular hell, but they could also denote loss of money as well, and as such should have a metaphorical sense.

³¹ See A III 252f.; D III 85–6, 236 and Ud. 86.

Where there is a continuity with the teachings pertinent primarily to the monk is in the emphasis on conduct – sīlā – and its acquisition (sīlasampada) (D II 236) or loss (sīlavipatti) (D II 235). Whilst this is one of the three limbs of the eight-limbed path, it also falls within the general ambit of conduct in the sense that the Vinaya provides a set of rules observance of which will be conducive to the cultivation of the more imposing aspects of Buddhist life.

These teachings are definitely not those conceiving exclusively of a society of renunciators. On the contrary they could be interpreted as strengthening the foundations of civil society in a collective sense even while they focus primarily on the development of the individual within that society. Therefore we are compelled to ask what the Buddha was intending to achieve in offering teachings like this, which are, if it be asked, widespread through the Canon, if not in a systematic form, but rather as part of an overall ethical ambience which is offered. What we can be certain of is that it is not the kind of teaching any brāhmaṇical ascetic would have offered. It is much too close to the urban perspective dominating Pāli literature and it is far too individualistic in its tone, the latter in the sense of defining the individual's status primarily against a social and not a spiritual standard. Any discrimination is restricted to where it reflects relative status apparently held by those within the respective classes.

³² III 45. This passage could be profitably compared with arguments for the acquisition of wealth put forward in Mbh 3, 36 and 12, 8.

If what is being taught is individualistic it is also communalistic. The Buddha is not only teaching a form of behaviour which will benefit the individual in both this world and the next, he is also prescribing the means whereby the individual will be treated positively by other people within the groups in which he moves. It is this sense of offering a standardized ethics³³ applicable to anybody of any class or occupation that makes this passage an important one for presenting a concern for social cohesion. That it is directed towards an elite, and in the language typically associated with mercantilist values, does not lessen the social breadth of its message.

³³ J. D. Ryan, 'The Civakacintamani in Historical Perspective' (unpublished thesis, University of California, Berkeley, 1985), pp. 14–15.

Economic conditions

An acceptance that Buddhism originally began as an elite movement requires us to extend our discussion into a study of the economic conditions associated with elite status, the relationship between these conditions and the development and survival of Buddhism. Weberian analysis has long shown the complex interplay between material development and ideological support or denial from religious groups. Buddhist doctrine appeared to provide active encouragement to the most striking of the newly emergent groups exploiting changed political and productive conditions, namely the merchants and farmers. The former group, while certainly not homogeneous, was not only developing into a major producer and disseminator of new kinds of goods, but was also very active in promoting its own status and its concerns as being central to those of society. The perception that Buddhism provided an ideological support to this group leads us to confront a number of questions rising in part from the previous chapter:

- (1) Why would an ascetic group disdainful of material wealth, and the motivations leading to its accumulation, give ideological support to such a group?
- (2) Why would this group in return provide material support to the fledgling Buddhist group?
- (3) What kind of economy was it that allowed this group to emerge and apparently become so successful?

To answer these requires us first to investigate the economic conditions of the time. It is difficult to envisage an 'economy' existing in the Buddha's time. The economy is at best an abstract term used to categorize and describe particular aspects of human interaction. But economic activity is clearly described in Buddhist literature. We must, however, be constantly vigilant to avoid applying the terminology of contemporary economics to events and conditions that are distorted by the use of such technical terms. We assume, following Pearson, that 'the economy at all levels of material existence is a social process of interaction between man and his environment in the course of which goods and services change form, are moved about and change hands. The shape of this process, i.e., its institutional form and the motives which make it run are determined not by any single factor either in nature or man, but are the resultants of several interdependent levels of human existence, ecological, technological, social and cultural.¹ Taking this as a lead we treat social and economic conditions together, even at the risk of confusing two overlapping conceptual categories.

THE NATURE OF THE ECONOMY

Following archaeological and literary evidence, we have noted in earlier chapters that the Buddhist texts depict economic conditions based on agriculture, pastoralism, small-scale manufacture of material goods of a large variety of types and the incipient development of an industry making money out of money itself. Production was for both subsistence and trade. Money was an important means of exchange.² Money lending was no doubt common, judging from the presence of wealthy bankers, and forms of taxation were probably beginning. Inequalities based on differences in possession of capital and land, and access to resources, were beginning to emerge in a perceptible way. All of this is easy to read as a collection of perhaps discrete data. What we lack is a sense of what a large-scale interconnected economy might have been like and the hard statistical data which would enable us to put flesh on the economy's interconnections.

In contrast to the equivocal evidence about the nature of the economy depicted in Vedic texts, and presumably prior to the emergence of early Buddhism, evidence from the Buddhist sources suggests a prosperous economy in a state of expansion. Nor is this a swift conclusion produced by an impressionistic reading of the texts which are only concerned incidentally with what today would be called economics. Our knowledge about the nature and strength of the economy in the Buddha's time and the following centuries is substantially based on inference. Yet the inference of an expanding economy is confirmed by more solid evidence derived from the study of food remains and settlement patterns.

¹ H. W. Pearson, 'The economy has no surplus: critique of a theory of development', in K. Polanyi, C. M. Arensberg and H. W. Pearson (eds), Trade and Market in the Early Empires (Free Press, New York, 1957), p. 326 (his italics).

² J. Cribb, identifying the errors that inspired some scholars to date Indian coins to earlier times, concludes that the earliest Indian coins, the various punch-marked silver issues, originated in the Gandhāra area from imitations of Greek coins early in the fourth century BC, and that developments from these soon took place in the Ganges valley during the same century. See J. Cribb, 'Dating India's earliest coins', in J. Schotsmans and M. Taddei (eds.), South Asian Archaeology 1983 (Istituto Universitario Orientale, Naples, 1985), vol. 1, pp. 535-54.

In Vedic literature, the economic conditions hinted at define a much narrower base of production and consumption. It is accurate to speak of a tribal economy, where there was some trade with other tribal groups and with people leading a sedentary lifestyle, but where the social extent of the economy was substantially defined by the members of the tribe, and its physical extent by the area where the tribe wandered. Whilst measures of wealth exist in nomadic tribes in the varied holdings of flocks particular individuals might have, every person was ultimately protected by the safety net offered by the social group defining the tribe. If at various times such an economy were evaluated as 'weak' (and this could only be done on the basis of the archaeological record), it could only be on the measure of its incapacity to feed its own people in a totalistic sense or by a measure of food insecurity (where the availability of food is highly variable), a situation we would usually retrospectively attribute to drought, some other natural calamity or war. What we can glean from Vedic literature provides a simpler picture than this, however. Using the Brāhmaṇas, Rau gives a pessimistic view of the quality of life they depict:

[I]n spite of the fertility of the Indian soil and the favourable climatic conditions, it could have been by no means easy to nourish themselves and their herds. Again and again the texts assert that the real enemy of men is hunger. It is identical with death and darkness, while heaven is explained as the place where hunger and thirst are unknown.³

In reading the Pāli texts we are immediately struck by the difference in landscape in which economic conditions are projected. Noteworthy is the presence of large cities which became large precisely because they are located at the junction of trading routes or because they are administrative centres and allow for increasing division of labour, diversification of production techniques and the use of capital. A further aspect of this landscape is the juxtaposition of city and (rural) hinterland, reflected strongly in the inter-regional trading featured so heavily in the texts. Whilst the idea of micro-economies focused on the village or group of contiguous villages has relevance in this situation, it has to be seen in relation to the dramatic increase in trading. Additionally, the idea of levying taxes across a large region, especially when it is populated by distinctive groups, suggests the presence of an economy definitely increasing in size, complexity and centralized control. Development of industries and class differentiation based on property ownership could allow a situation where relative prosperity coexisted with relative poverty, including denominated debt. The economy could still be vibrant and showing increased productivity even though some groups in society were economically depressed.

³ Rau, Staat und Gesellschaft, p. 31.

The Buddhist texts provide us with much evidence about rural and urban trade and production. Here we present some of this evidence in order to allow us to step back and draw some inferences about the economy as a whole. The style of description in the text is idealized. Here, for instance, is a Jātaka description of a city pullulating with business activity: 'a city furnished with solid foundations and with many gateways and walls . . . behold the drinking shops and taverns, the slaughter-houses and cooks' shops, and the harlots and wantons . . . the garland-weavers, the washermen, the astrologers, the cloth merchants, the gold workers, the jewellers . . .'⁴ Other evidence suggests the likelihood that every city had its quarters for the carrying on of specific crafts, such as the street of ivory carvers in Kāśī;⁵ beyond the walls were dedicated craft villages serving the city's needs, such as communities of carpenters, potters, and smiths making axes, hatchets, ploughshares, spikes and so forth.⁶ Communities of actors worked under the direction of stage managers to produce upon the stage a deceitful illusion of reality.⁷ The first three examples are all taken from the Jātakas, which are late in comparison to the other sources we are using, and should be taken as indicating changes that had occurred by the end of the period of Buddhism's early development.

Craftsmen were divided into communities; the hereditary character of their occupation was taken for granted, and there are references to trade organizations approximating to guilds.⁸ A passage in a Jātaka refers to a hereditary grain merchant.⁹ Buddhist canonical sources refer to communities of carpenters, vulture trainers, cowherds, liquor distillers,¹⁰ dyers, garland makers, cattle butchers, pig slaughterers, fowlers, horse trainers, jailers, bath attendants, potters and ivory workers, goldsmiths, ditchers, fletchers, joiners, archers, conch-blowers, trappers, bamboo plaiters, cartwrights and scavengers.¹¹ The last four in this list are identified as low-class occupations, as are those of leather workers, reed workers, potters, tailors and barbers.¹² Service occupations culled by Wagle include those

⁴ JVI 276. ⁵ Fick, Soziale Gliederung, p. 180. ⁶ Ibid., p. 181.

⁷ S IV 306–8. ⁸ Fick, Soziale Gliederung, pp. 177–9.

⁹ J III 198 where a grain merchant's son is said to go into the same business.

¹⁰ M I 119, 130, 220, 228.

¹¹ See, for example, from the first two books of M; M I 343, 385, 387, 396, 412, 446; M II 15, 18, 23, 65, 105, 152 and 205. In these passages numerous crafts and trades are mentioned, frequently chosen as suitable topics for familiar metaphors.

¹² See Wagle, Society, pp. 135ff.

of the washerman-dyer, painter, tailor-weaver, cook, messenger, servant-companion and attendant.¹³

These references all derive from literary sources across a span of several centuries, beginning in perhaps 400 BCE, but extending with the Jātakas to the early centuries of the Christian era. That there should be so many classifiable occupations in a developing urban society should not surprise us and the archaeological evidence also confirms this. However, we have no way of knowing anything like relative numbers of the people in such professions. It is possible that there were only two vulture trainers in each large city, for example, and fletchers presumably would have waxed and waned in numbers as demand for their services changed depending on external military situations. In addition, we cannot be certain about the spread of these occupations across the urban/rural divide, though we would expect the greater number of new occupational classes to be associated with urbanization and the sources confirm this.

It is possible that brahmins often entered such occupational classes. Brahmins are referred to as supporting themselves by various occupations other than acting as priest, including 'calculation' or accountancy (gaṇanā),¹⁴ though it was not thought right that a brahmin should follow secular occupations. The Sutta Nipāta declares that if one lives by mechanical arts one is an artisan, not a brahmin.¹⁵ The reality is that many brahmins were farmers, the economy not being sufficiently rich to support an entire class of people who simply lived off the paid performance of ritual activity. High-status professions – perhaps based on remuneration as well as social class – would have included accounting, money-changing, surgery, medicine and writing.¹⁶

Inscriptional evidence joins literature in reflecting the richness of the urban economy. At Mathurā there were perfumers, bankers, metalworkers, and the treasurer of an association; the same city is mentioned also by Patañjali in about the second century BCE as a source of kettledrums, garments and coins, hence of intra-regional trade.¹⁷ To this we can add archaeological evidence, but it remains more opaque than the literary or inscriptional evidence as we cannot often attribute direct occupational categories to particular data. Erdosy sums up some of the archaeological evidence: large-scale production of iron is indicated at a number of sites where iron slag abounds, especially Ujjain; Rairh has hundreds of silver punch-marked coins, and there are coppersmiths' furnaces there, with moulds. At

¹³ Ibid., p. 136. ¹⁴ M II 1. ¹⁵ Sn 613. ¹⁶ Wagle, Society, pp. 140ff.

¹⁷ F. R. Allchin, The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995), p. 295.

Rājghat there were bone arrow factories; beads were made at Ujjain and jewellers' moulds have been found at Campā. Crafts are generally very well represented in the larger settlements.¹⁸

The Buddhist texts are clear in attesting a dynamic economy with a high degree of occupational and product diversification. Cities were homes for a highly differentiated and fully urbanized commercial society in the period for which the texts can be considered to vouch. But we cannot draw any firm conclusions about whether we are dealing with a whole set of micro-economies that trade with each other, especially those operating in the larger urban areas. The view that there existed some kind of developing macro-economy rests on the impression of possibilities as much as anything else, possibilities unavailable in micro-economies because of their absence of economies of scale and a body of consumers demanding a wide differentiation of products. Included amongst such possibilities would be: the existence of long-distance trade as evidenced by caravans and demarcated trading routes; the protection of such routes by large-scale political authorities; the widespread production of luxury goods and the existence of a surplus.

TRADE

A sure sign of the development of an effectively functioning macro-economy is the presence of a very large intra- and inter-regional trading sector. Buddhist literature is full of references to trading caravans, guilds of merchants, market towns and roads along which trading caravans moved.¹⁹ So frequent are the references that it is clear intra-regional and inter-city trade was already regarded as a typical activity requiring no comment, therefore a standard component of the economic life of the time. For our purpose the importance of these references is that they not only provide information about one aspect of an emerging macro-economy, they also tie the dispersal of the Buddhist Order and Buddhism directly into the expansion of trade, such that early Buddhism may well have been associated with the trading vocation.

Long-distance land trade took groups of merchants in caravans through wilderness²⁰ and forest to seek out markets in all the towns of northern (and increasingly southern) India. Intra-regional trade, which probably meant between the large urban centres, flourished, though to speak of international trade would require the recognition of international boundaries. Trade routes linked the pioneering new world of the middle Ganges, with its rising cities, to the rest of northern India and beyond to the zones of Achaemenid and later Hellenic culture, as well as to the south. It is specially to be noted that the arteries of commerce passed through the home territories of Buddhist tradition, linking the centralized monarchies along the Ganges with the more sparsely settled upland territories inhabited by tribal confederacies or oligarchies (gaṇas) such as the Buddha's own natal community and, further afield, with the sources of cultural influence in Afghanistan and Iran that became so conspicuous in the fourth and third centuries.

¹⁸ Erdosy, 'City states', p. 112.

¹⁹ Much of the relevant information for a period two centuries later is catalogued in G. M. Bongard-Levin, Mauryan India (Sterling, New Delhi, 1985), pp. 133–6.

²⁰ See J I 107, 99.

Whilst the literary sources do not give us detailed descriptions of trading caravans as they must have operated over a long and continuous period of time, they do allude frequently enough to such caravans. For instance, in one text we are told that whilst en route to Rājagaha the Buddha came into contact with 'Belatṭha Kaccāna who was going along the main road from Rājagaha to Andhakavindha with five hundred wagons all filled with jars of sugar'.²¹ Another Jātaka tale speaks of two caravan leaders, plus 500 wagons, journeying from east to west for trade, returning to Sāvatti with large profits.²² The Vinaya refers to regular caravan settlements²³ and a Jain story tells of a caravan of merchants in the desert.²⁴ Despite this we are not in a position to be able to determine the relative percentages of production for local consumption and production for trade beyond the immediate locality of the area in which the goods were produced. Nonetheless we can be certain production was for profit and where there was the idea of profit, the idea of a disposable surplus developed. Perhaps this was related to the high level of risk associated with long-distance trade and the consciousness of wilderness as a category defining risk.²⁵

It is possible trade was mentioned ubiquitously in Buddhist literature not just because it was conspicuous in the society reflected in the texts, but because the actual development and expansion of Buddhism was so closely connected with it. Buddhist monks often travelled with caravans of merchants and there is an example of the Buddha allowing a monk to pass the rainy season in the company of a caravan.²⁶ It is likely the extension of Buddhist culture into the Deccan was closely associated with ²¹ Vin I 244ff. ²² J II 181, 335. Cf. J I 377f., 107; Vin I 152; III. 46; D II 342.

²³ Vin III 46. ²⁴ Basham, Ajīvikas, p. 59, citing the Bhagavatī Sūtra.

²⁵ See J I 99 distinguishing five different types of wilderness. Cf. Fick, Soziale Gliederung, pp. 175ff.

²⁶ Vin I 152.

trade. An itinerary in the Sn traces the route of Bāvarī's disciples along a route from Amarāvātī to Kapilavastu that takes in the Krishna, the western Deccan, Patiṭṭhāna, Ujjenī, Vedisā, Sanchi, Kosambī, and Sāvattī, and pre-Sātavāhana remains suggest trade along this route.²⁷

THE TONE OF THE ECONOMY: LUXURY GOODS AND STRATIFICATION OF ACCESS TO RESOURCES

Much of the evidence so far adduced tells us unambiguously that Buddhism was linked with economic advance and commercial expansion. In addition, the evidence of both texts and archaeology is of a vibrant economy producing a substantial range of goods for a whole set of consumption preferences. It would be tempting to say this is primarily a picture of an urban-based economy supported by a large agricultural sector, operating at different levels of development, and with inter-regional trade providing luxury goods. To say there is enough evidence to evaluate the economy as strong or weak begs too many questions to be meaningful, but we do need also to look at any evidence suggestive of weakness in economic conditions during the time reflected in the early Buddhist texts. This would have relevance to questions of income distribution and access to resources as both of these are factors essential in the determination of economic stratification in a given society and the emergent class differentials based on income inequality. If the Pāli sources are indeed indicative of a vibrant, growing economy (which does not automatically translate into economic equity), we must be able to explain any evidence to the contrary. Mostly what we have been able to find are references to food shortages in particular areas and to mentions of despised groups such as Caṇḍālas who might also have been economically depressed. Usually the references to famines use stock expressions to describe a condition of food shortage. Food is said to be difficult to obtain either by gleaning or by gift, white bones are seen and people dig out little pieces of grain from holes in the ground using sticks. Places such as Verañjā, Sāvattī and Vajjī are mentioned as experiencing such conditions.²⁸ Other cases just use one of the words (usually dubbhikkham)

²⁷ Sn 1011–13. Cf. H. P. Ray, Monastery and Guild. Commerce under the Sātavāhanas (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1986), pp. 64 and 82ff.

²⁸ "At that time Verañjā was short of alms-food (dubbhikkhā), which was difficult to obtain (dvīhītikā), it was white with bones and people were living by digging out little pieces of grain from holes in the ground using sticks (salākāvuttā). Nor was it easy to nourish oneself by gleaning or by favour." Vin III 6, 64, 87. For the whole phrase Rhys Davids and Stede (eds), Pali-English Dictionary also gives Vin II 175; IV 23; S IV 323 amongst eighteen references in total. The translation of the compound salākāvuttā is based on the explanation given in Divyāvadana, p. 131 line 21. See also I.B. Horner, The Book of the Discipline (Luzac & Co. (PTS), London, 1938), vol. 1, p. 11, n. 4.

of the stock description.²⁹ In such circumstances a monk is recorded³⁰ as having stolen food, thereby committing a parājika offence, or people take food to the monastery rather than monks making begging rounds.³¹

It may be that these and other references are little more than allusions to an occasional famine. A more conservative view would stress the conclusion that the stereotypical style of many of the statements conveying the impression of food shortage betray a sub-text of restricting the kind of diets available to the monk or nun and therefore allude only to hypothetical conditions. No doubt there were crop failures – a disaster if sufficient seed stock and supplies from previous years had not been saved –, droughts and damage to agricultural production and production of consumer goods caused by war. The texts are largely silent on this and the negative evidence suggestive of failure to provide for the basics of life is weak. It is not, however, entirely absent and such cases as the following do occasionally occur:

Once when Sāvathī was short of alms-food (dubbhikkhe), a certain monk deliberately stole a handful of rice belonging to a shop-keeper. [Though he was remorseful this was considered a parājika offence.³²]

At that time when alms-food was scarce [the families of a village] offered only a small amount of a food to the monks who refused it after some consideration.³³ [The text goes on to cite several other times when food was scarce and monks resorted to eating, all of which the Buddha prohibited.]

These passages suggest the monks did share the privations encountered during famines, even if they still did have access to food given as a result of begging. They are more informative for what they tell us about the privileged status of monks vis-à-vis the rest of the population than serving as signs for some endemic long-term weakness of the economy.

The other sign of possible weaknesses in economic conditions – in an environment where resources were not being exhaustively exploited – is to be found in the occasional descriptions of groups regarded as being depressed in one form or another. As broadly descriptive as they are, such passages definitely point to groups which were already being stigmatized as economically weak, but more generally they should be taken as further evidence for the increasing differentiation of society along the lines of wealth and access to wealth. This differentiation need not have been directly correlated with other forms of social differentiation such as the varṇa scheme. A few passages have been cited above in the context of distinguishing between high and low occupations and marginalized groups.³⁴ A further passage describes a king Serī who used to have alms given, at each of the four gates to his city, to brahmins and recluses, those suffering great hardship, tramps, charlatans and beggars. When members of his harem (itthāgāraṃ), and others, then ask to be allowed to do the same, he lets them and then finds himself giving nothing, so he decrees that of the revenue coming in from the outlying provinces, half should be brought into the palace and half given to those who ask for it.³⁵

²⁹ Vin I 211–14. Cf. Vin I 219ff., where monks are offered elephant-flesh, horse-flesh, dog-flesh and snake-flesh, at a time when food is scarce, yet the Buddha prohibits them all.

³⁰ Vin III 6. ³¹ Vin I 211. ³² Vin III 64. ³³ Vin I 214.

If the evidence for economic and social distress in early Buddhist literature is sparse and opaque of interpretation, the same cannot be said for indications of the presence of luxury goods and the conspicuous display of material wealth. The following examples may seem hyperbolic, but are too common to be omitted. Luxury goods are often mentioned in the possession of monks and, primarily, to illustrate the great variety within a single category, we cite several examples from the fifth book of the Mahāvagga:

- (1) 'At that time the group of six monks used various kinds of ointment boxes, made of gold or silver.' After criticism from laymen, the Buddha allowed only ointment boxes made from bone, ivory, horn, reed, bamboo, wood, resin, crystal, copper and the centre of a conch shell.³⁶
- (2) 'At that time the group of six monks used, for their high beds and large beds, the following: a sofa, a couch, a long woollen cloth, a cloth of many colours, a white woollen cloth, a woollen cloth embroidered with flowers, a mattress, a woollen cloth decorated with animals, a woollen cloth with hair on the upper side, a woollen cloth with a fringe, a silken cloth studded with jewels, a silken cloth, a dancer's carpet, an elephant rug, a horse rug, a chariot rug, a rug of black antelope skins, the precious hide of the kadali-deer, a sheet with an awning above, a couch with a red cushion at either end.'³⁷
- (3) 'At that time the group of six monks wore sandals with straps around the heels . . . moccasins . . . laced boots . . . sandals stuffed with cotton . . . sandals coloured like partridges' wings . . . sandals pointed with rams' horns . . . sandals with a ram's horn tied on . . . sandals with a goat's horn tied on . . . sandals having scorpions' tails . . . sandals bordered with peacocks' tail feathers . . . coloured sandals.'³⁸

Whether all of these products were available for sale, or whether the authors of the text sought to be exhaustive in their prohibitions, will always remain open to speculation. Nor should we be surprised to find most of them were forbidden to monks because they would have violated the image of poverty ³⁴ SI 93ff. See above, pp. 42–6.

³⁵ SI 58.

³⁶ Vin I 203.

³⁷ Vin I 192.

³⁸ Vin I 186.

and modesty the monk was required to cultivate.³⁹ What is of importance for the present discussion is that such diversity within specific categories of goods was available in an economy probably not long expanded from a subsistence base, and that they fall into the range of what today would be called luxury goods.

The presence of luxuries is also reflected in other measures besides the diversity of products. Many wealthy courtesans, charging high prices, are mentioned in the texts.⁴⁰ Entertainment of other kinds is sometimes recorded as attracting large payments⁴¹ and wealthy merchants and brahmins are recorded as offering sumptuous gifts.⁴² Wealthy men are also recorded as having guards, which would be expected for trading caravans because they were travelling through wilderness areas, but not perhaps in urban areas. All of this clearly shows that wealth was concentrated in certain hands, but that this did not exclude the bulk of the population having access to at least a subsistence level of resources.

THE IDEA OF A SURPLUS

The emergence of changed economic conditions, methods of production and patterns of consumption went hand in hand with the rise of Buddhism. Whilst this does not establish a necessary causal connection, it is a basic truth that an ascetic movement like Buddhism could not have survived in the absence of a broadly based disposable surplus of production beyond subsistence needs. That such a surplus existed is inferable from the presence of luxury goods, social stratification based in part on access to resources and, finally, on the increasing expansion of bureaucratic structures whose financial support⁴³ was necessarily derived from taxes and other imposts. We cannot even guess at what the size of the surplus might have been because this would not only require a valuation of the total production of North-Eastern India in the Buddha's time, it would also require a breaking up of the value of this production into distinctive categories – capital, taxes, luxury goods, expenditure for sumptuary display – not available to us. Nonetheless, surplus there was and the new religious groups certainly ³⁹ Cf. also T. Brekke, 'The early saṅgha and the laity', JIAS, 20/2 (1997), pp. 28–9.

⁴⁰ J III 435, 261; D II 96, where the Licchavi princes offer Ambapālī a hundred thousand [kahāpaṇa] if she will give up her meal with the Buddha.

⁴¹ J II 431, 294. ⁴² J II 428, 291; D II 182.

⁴³ On the latter see H. P. Ray, 'Trade and Contacts', in R. Thapar (ed.), Recent Perspectives of Early Indian History (Popular Prakashan, Bombay, 1995), p. 143. Cf. also von Simson, 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund', pp. 91–2.

benefited from this, a benefit predicated on the belief in society that it was proper to support these new groups financially.

McNeill argues that, on the basis of epidemiological factors, any surplus produced in the Ganges valley during the period covered in this book would have been small. He suggests, 'From a distance India looked wealthy, since its imports were gems and spices, but in spite of that reputation it seems likely that the subcontinent as a whole was always comparatively poor inasmuch as a rather slender margin existed in most times and places between what an average peasant family could produce and what it needed for survival.'⁴⁴ He uses this argument as one reason why asceticism developed so strongly in ancient India. Ascetic practices involved dietary and bodily restraints, a practice well suited for a society producing only a small food surplus.⁴⁵ However, the idea of an absolute surplus of production over a subsistence level of living may well be irrelevant to the very idea of surplus, even of a minimal surplus as implied by McNeill. Pearson has argued that the level of surplus is not biological, but social:

A given quantity of goods or services would be surplus only if the society in some manner set these quantities aside and declared them to be available for a specific purpose. Into this category might then fall such things as food set aside for ceremonial feasts or in anticipation of future dearth, war chests, budgetary surpluses, or savings for whatever purpose. The essential point is that relative surpluses are initiated by the society in question. It is true that such surpluses may be made to appear along with a wind-fall increase of material means, or a more permanent rise in productive capacity: but they may also be created with no change whatever in the quantity of subsistence means by re-allocating goods or services from one use to another.⁴⁶

Accepting this broader view of surplus compels us to ask not what the minimal level of economic subsistence might be, but what cultural forces within society – such as prestige or access to the sacred – resulted in economic goods being acquired for purposes other than the material subsistence of those who produced them.

To understand how this surplus might have been used a dichotomy should be drawn, no doubt historically based, between Buddhism conceived primarily as a group of eremitic monks and as a religion focused on monastic institutions and parish priests. There must be implications for the utilization of economic resources arising from the activity of the monk who wanders around from house to house begging for food. We assume that on a very small scale such a monk would place minimum pressure on his begging environment except in times of famine. The agricultural surplus required to feed such figures would not have been excessive and any given village could probably support a few monks with relative ease for a long period. If though, a century after the death of the Buddha, there are many (say twenty) monks and a small monastery on the outskirts of the village, then the situation becomes quite different. The presence of the Buddhist institution could become a veritable drain on the economic prosperity of the village, though any one monastery could have survived off several neighbouring villages. Ultimately we cannot give precision to the question of how the presence of monks and monastic organizations materially and ideologically affected the economic impulses of individuals or socio-economic groups in ancient northeastern India. What is needed here is a systematic effort in locating and statistically analysing the number of villages grouped in close proximity to a given monastery. Nor, and maybe this is of greater significance if only because of the potential size, do we know how the presence of a monastery might have increased demand in the local economy of the area in which it was located. Two factors should be relevant: (1) the simple function of the saṅgha as a purchaser of goods and services from the local area, hence a stimulator of demand for certain goods, and (2) the role of the saṅgha in creating an ideational motivation for increasing production or in modifying the methods of distribution.

⁴⁴ McNeill, Plagues and Peoples, p. 92.

⁴⁵ Ibid., p. 93.

⁴⁶ Pearson, 'Economy', p. 323.

An early proponent of this focus on the monastery as stimulant to economic activity was D. D. Kosambi, who noted the presence of Mother-Goddess cult sites along prehistoric tracks. H. P. Ray succinctly summarizes his findings: 'Many of these became prosperous and prominent Buddhist centres developed at these spots in the Early Historical period. These were well-endowed with land and money donations both by the ruling Sātavāhanas and by members of the trading community. Analogies with Buddhist monastic establishments in China led Kosambi to postulate a symbiotic relationship between the monastic centres and the local populace.'⁴⁷ Since the time when his work was first published an increase in the rate of archaeological excavation, and new evidence for the details of distinctive regional cultures this has produced, have allowed us to offer more precision to the exact nature of this relationship.⁴⁸ H. P. Ray has called attention to the possible role of pilgrimage in the symbiosis of commerce and Buddhism as both travelled the trade routes.

⁴⁷ Ray, 'Trade and Contacts', p. 148.

⁴⁸ An example would be the site of Dharaṇīkota, associated with the Amarāvati stūpa, which is likely to be very early; claims have been made for the fourth century BC, and there is certainly evidence suggesting occupation at the time of Aśoka, with Buddhist activity also attributed to the third century: R. Knox, Amaravati: Buddhist Sculpture from the Great Stūpa (British Museum, London, 1992), pp. 10–13.

Apart from the obvious point that the monasteries are centres of consumption⁴⁹ little more is said about their economic implications. The results of recent archaeological research, however, entails that the relationship of dependence between monasteries and centres of economic activity must be re-theorized in a more comprehensive manner than has hitherto been done. Consider the view of Heitzman:

[A]round 500 BC, a pattern of settlements occupied on a permanent basis, spread from North India throughout South Asia. By the third century BC, major institutional forms of imperial power and long-distance trade were centred in nodes of permanent settlement connected by trade routes. Buddhist monastic sites grew up at these nodes and along the routes, serving as symbolic structures mediating social hierarchy within a new urban complex. The triad of political power and commerce centred in stable occupational sites, associated with Buddhism as a major religious component, lasted into the Christian era.⁵⁰

This suggests that monastic centres survived as much because they fulfilled certain secular functions (i.e., demonstrating social hierarchies by means of prestatory gifts) as because of performing particular pastoral and educative functions. But this secular function was not necessarily associated with trade, or if it was, we have not yet understood what its precise relationship with trade might have been. Heitzman is instructive, once more:

Although Buddhist monastic sites were consistently associated with non-monastic locations and with the two institutional components – empire and trade – which organized the network of permanent settlement, there is little archaeological evidence to suggest that the Buddhist sites themselves had any purely political or economic role. In the vast majority of cases, monasteries are situated at a distance from the non-monastic structural concentrations . . . The location of the Buddhist monastic sites at a distance from the scenes of political and economic activity made their direct participation in such activity inefficient. There is, furthermore, no artificial or structural evidence pointing to military, storage, or industrial functions within monasteries . . .⁵¹

⁴⁹ Jonathon Walters' arguments about the holding of Buddhist festivals in Aśokan India might also relate to this subject, as they would be centres of heightened economic activity, even if only at intermittent times during the year. See J. Walters, 'A voice from the silence. The Buddhist Mother's Story', HR, 33/34 (1994), p. 368.

⁵⁰ J. Heitzman, 'Early Buddhism, trade and empire', in K. A. R. Kennedy and Gregory L. Possehl (eds), Studies in the Archeology and Paleoanthropology of South Asia (Oxford and IBH Publishing Co., New Delhi, 1984), p. 121.

⁵¹ Ibid., p. 131.

Morrison presents a picture which makes the prevailing view seem even more contradictory. She notes: 'Monastic sites situated at this boundary [of Ghat passes] would have been in a position to take advantage of the produce of both environmental zones. Further, the earliest monastic sites were located in the areas of most secure agricultural production, pointing to their need for surplus produce and their close relationship with cultivated produce.'⁵² This point is not as obvious as one might think. Clearly, a large non-productive institution will necessarily be in close proximity with food-producing areas in order to survive, though this does not guarantee a particular kind of stimulus to the expansion of trade in that area. Furthermore, in Morrison's words, affirming Heitzman's point cited earlier, 'Monastic sites are notable for their lack of evidence for large-scale storage, craft production, or any other indication of participation in exchange networks other than as recipients of gifts.'⁵³ It is quite significant that none of this can be confirmed for the very early period of Buddhism as the available texts simply lack detailed descriptions of monasteries. Nor can much be gleaned from them about the interaction between the monastery and the regions and social groupings in immediate proximity with it. The overwhelming impression is that the Vinaya and the Nikāyas are providing a description of a Buddhism where the interaction is between individual monks and the laity, except where it is a question of portraying the heretical activities of the group of six monks, whose standard of behaviour is always condemned. Of course, the saṅgha was present in a group then and in small sub-groups relating to particular areas and the pātimokkha rules obviously imply the presence of a large organization requiring a degree of administrative control. So too do the donations received by the Buddha from the wealthy, most of which were used to purchase land or construct buildings for the emerging order. Yet we have great difficulty in extrapolating from the texts themselves to the post-Aśokan situation (depicted in the archaeological record) where Buddhism had become substantially a monastic order.

ECONOMIC SUPPORT FOR THE BUDDHIST ORDER

The principal religious motive for providing support was for the personal acquisition of good merit and because generosity was part of the expected role of a lay Buddhist. Like any holy figure, a monk was a field of merit from which positive returns could be gained by giving. In addition, as we argue in a later chapter, providing material support to the saṅgha made available the possibility for demonstration of sumptuary acts, the purpose of which may have had more to do with social status than acquisition of merit. Support for the saṅgha, at the level at which it must have been practised – especially when Buddhism began to expand rapidly after the reign of Aśoka – must have been too large for the produce of a subsistence economy. No doubt, in some small villages it must have been the case that individual monks were supported by families who could at times have scarcely raised enough to feed themselves. We are not in a position to know if the bulk of support during the growth of Buddhism in its earliest centuries came from this source or whether it derived from the highly conspicuous support from the most successful of the social elites.

⁵² K. Morrison, 'Trade, urbanism and agricultural expansion: Buddhist monastic institutions and the state in early historic western Deccan', World Archeology, 27 (1995), p. 216.

⁵³ Ibid., p. 217.

Buddhist donors as they are reflected in the texts, or later in inscriptions, can be divided into two categories corresponding to small and large, on the one hand, and institutional or individual, on the other hand. The majority of the examples concern monks being supported by individual families in specific villages:

‘Once, as a certain monk was going to the village, he said to another monk: ‘Your reverence, let me speak on your behalf⁵⁴ to the family which supports you (upaṭṭhākakulam).’ He went there, had an outer cloak brought and used it for himself (attanā paribhuñji). After finding out about this the other monk reprimanded him with the words, ‘You are not a true recluse’ (. . . asamaṇo ‘si tvaṇ ti).⁵⁵

‘At one time in Campā, a nun who was the pupil of the nun Thullanandā went to the family who supported Thullanandā, and said: “The lady wants to drink rice-gruel containing the three pungent spices.” She had it cooked, took it away with her and ate it by herself (attanā paribhuñji). After finding out about this, she reprimanded her with the words, “You are not a true female recluse” (asamaṇī ‘si tvaṇ ti).⁵⁶

‘Once in Vesālī, the householder who was the supporter (upaṭṭhākassa gahapatino) of the venerable Ajjuka had two children, a son and a nephew . . .⁵⁷

Another passage alludes to an entire village of monks and yet another to a commercial guild supplying robes to the six heretical monks.⁵⁸ The latter, in particular, is quite revealing in showing how dependence can become too strongly displayed, almost to the point where it becomes emotional blackmail. Here the moral is that the whole giving relationship has become ⁵⁴ ‘let me speak on your behalf’, vutto vajjemīti. On this phrase see Horner, The Book of the Discipline, vol. 1, p. 102, n. 1.

⁵⁵ Vin III 61. ⁵⁶ Vin III 66, 67. ⁵⁷ Vin III 66. ⁵⁸ Vin I 149 and III 265, respectively.

too individualized and that giving should be regarded as to the Order as a whole. The group of six monks has asked a guild for robes:

[The guild speaking:] ‘Honoured monks, we will not give them. Every year we designate alms-food and robes for the Order.’

[The monks reply:] ‘Good people, the Order has many donors and many devotees (bhattā). We live here because we depend on and look to you, but if you won’t give to us, then who will give to us? Good people, give this robe material to us.’

Being pressured by the group of six monks, the guild then gave the group of six monks the robe material and served the Order with a meal which was prepared appropriately.

The other monks, knowing that robe material and a meal had been prepared for the Order, but not knowing it had been given to the group of six monks, said this:

‘Good people, give the robe material to the Order.’

‘Honoured monks, there isn’t any: the masters, the group of six monks, appropriated for themselves the robe material that was prepared.’

[Then the modest monks asked how the six monks could take material for themselves that was meant for the Order as a whole. The Buddha declared this to be a nissaggiya offence.]⁵⁹

These examples, especially the first, imply that monks cultivated relationships of support with individual families. This in turn implies two more things, first, that the family was a lay Buddhist family, and secondly, that the monk was either a local in the area who had known the family before he became a monk or a newcomer to the area who had developed a relationship with a family he knew to be Buddhist in sympathy. How long these relations would have taken to develop is not possible to determine from the texts, though there are many examples of laypeople giving spontaneously to individual monks and groups of monks as well as others who deal with only one set of monks. All three also imply there were some misgivings about the donor–monk relationship, the expression ‘enjoyed/used it himself’ suggesting a critique of any idea of individual ownership of donated goods, that the gift is to the Order not to the individual monk.

But begging rounds did become almost formalized and there are cases in the Vinaya of prior preparations being made for a visit of the Buddha, preparations very similar to the kind of fund-raising occurring whenever the present Dalai Lama visits a particular country. An illustration is found in the first book of the Vinaya where the Buddha is depicted setting out for Ātumā with his retinue of 1,250 monks. There dwelt a barber who renounced when he was quite old, and still had two lay sons living in the village.

⁵⁹ Vin III 265.

He had two boys who had sweet voices, were intelligent, skilled, and good at the barber's trade because of their own teacher.

The barber heard that the monks were coming and decided to organize food to feed the Buddha and the monks. He said to his sons: 'It is said, sons, that the Lord is coming to Ātumā with a large Order of monks, totalling twelve hundred and fifty monks. Boys, go and take a barber's kit, wander from house to house for nāli measures of offerings, and collect salt, oil, husked rice and solid food, and when the Lord comes we will make him a drink of rice milk.'

'Yes, father,' said these boys, agreeing with him who had renounced when old. They took a barber's kit, wandered from house to house for offerings equal to a nāli measure, and collected salt, oil, husked rice and solid food to a measure of a nāli. When they saw these intelligent boys with their sweet voices, even the people who did not want to make offerings made them and gave much. So these boys collected much salt, oil, husked rice and solid food.⁶⁰

No doubt a small group of monks could have easily been accommodated, in this case by the barber, in either an urban or a rural area as long as there was not a major famine in process. It is likely too that a larger group could have been fed for a short time if it was known by the donors they were on a preaching tour as the Buddha is portrayed as doing in the Mahāvagga. In this latter sense they would almost be like an army⁶¹ or a troupe of wandering players.

Similar examples are given in the two following passages, one seemingly offering one-off support, the other establishing a long-term offer of support.

(1) [A]t that time a certain layman offered garlic to the Order of nuns, saying: 'If these ladies need garlic, I will supply it.' And he instructed the keeper of the field: 'If the nuns come, give two or three bundles to each nun.'

At that time there was a festival in Sāvattihī and the garlic was gone as soon as it was brought in. The nuns went up to the layman and said, 'Sir, we need garlic.' He said, 'There is none, ladies; the garlic is gone as soon as it is brought in; go to the field.' The nun Thullanandā went to the field, but did not exercise moderation and had too much garlic taken away.

[Then she was criticized by the keeper of the field and a folk tale is recited showing that, due to past kamma, she really is greedy.]⁶²

(2) 'A householder who had nice food gave a continual supply of food of four kinds to the Order. With his wife and children, he stayed in the kitchen and served food. One offered boiled rice, another curry, another oil and another offered

⁶⁰ Vin I 249–50.

⁶¹ The following passage even suggests the possibility of camp followers. 'Then the Lord, having stayed in Benares for as long as he wanted, set out on tour for Andhakavinda with a large group of monks, totalling twelve hundred and fifty. At that time the people of the area (jānapadā manussā) loaded much salt, oil, husked rice and solid food into wagons and followed close after the group of monks (buddhapamukhassa bhikkhusamghassa piṭṭhito-piṭṭhito anubaddhā honti) . . .' Vin I 220; 243–4.

⁶² Vin IV 258–9.

tit-bits.’ [Conflict arises when he does not wish to give food which had been apportioned by Dabba, the Mallian, to the followers of the monks Mettiya and Bhummajaka, whom the householder considers to be depraved. He serves them poor food and the monks blame Dabba.]⁶³

The gift-giving relationship was one that could be abused on both sides and was sometimes transparent enough to bring out divisions between monks within a particular area and, as in the case with Thullanandā, to raise the possibility of monks/nuns offending their donors.

The usual reward for generosity was merit transferred implicitly to the donor family, but there must have been cases where a more tangible reward was required and the monk obliged. In the Vinaya there are situations⁶⁴ where monks are approached to find abortive preparations or fertility drugs for women. These monks are said to be dependent on the women’s family for alms and are subsequently condemned by the Buddha for agreeing to find the abortive drugs. Another kind of dependence is reflected in a story told several times in the Vinaya. A monk en route to Sāvatti arrives at Kiṭṭāgiri. He goes looking for alms-food, adopting a comportment of great modesty. People see and ridicule him, saying that their own (monkish?) masters Assaji and Punabbasu are much more polite and that they should receive the alms instead of this monk. He received nothing until a layman invited him to his own house, where he invited him to eat. Then he criticizes the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu, because ‘Those who formerly were channels for gifts (dānapatha) to the Order are now cut off, they neglect the well-behaved monks, and the depraved monks stay on.’ He informs the Buddha who tells Sāriputta and Moggallāna to banish those monks from the Order.⁶⁵

The point in all these and other examples⁶⁶ is that they impose obligations on the monks who are involved in the formalized exchange of alms. Of course, this is to be expected, especially when a close relationship would build up over time between a monk and his supportive family. This would be the minimal condition for allowing the flow of alms to continue on a permanent basis, unless the prestige of dealing with a monk – a prestige enhanced by his reputation as a recipient of psychic power – was sufficient to guarantee continuity of alms, irrespective of whether there was personal knowledge of the monk on the part of the lay family.

Each of these examples restricts a single monk to a single family, or a single village, and whether or not this was coincidental cannot be determined from the textual sources. We are, however, entitled to speculate whether it was a deliberate policy of the Buddhists who were sensitive to the quantity of resources available to a family. The burden of feeding another person on a daily basis would have depended on the total and expected income stream of the family and the overall conditions pertaining to agriculture in a society still substantially based on agrarian activity.

⁶³ Vin III 160–1; cf. I 292. ⁶⁴ Vin III 83–4. ⁶⁵ Vin III 181.

⁶⁶ See Vin I 83, where the family supporting Sāriputta sent a youth to him requesting that the youth be allowed to renounce.

CONCLUSION

Because we do lack precise details of monastic developments in the early centuries of Buddhism, it is not possible to make an informed guess about the split between individual monks/nuns and groups of monks/nuns as percentages of the entire Order. After perhaps the end of the second century BCE we witness the widespread construction of monastic centres across many areas of South Asia, and it is likely that institutional support would have been required for their construction and maintenance. In the early centuries, though, we speculate that much of the support would have come from individual families of widely diverging degrees of wealth. A preparedness to offer such support already bespeaks an acceptance of Buddhism by a certain percentage of the population and either an on-going surplus of production over subsistence needs or a willingness to engage in self-sacrifice on the part of the laity, if not both of these.

It is important to speculate in this way because if we can demonstrate that individual family support for monks was substantially a product of an on-going productive surplus, that did not impinge on the security of food for the family, this has direct implications for the strength of what must have been an expanding economy in the Buddha's time. The evidence constituted by the large-scale and institutional donations of the wealthy is not as good as that provided by the arrangements with ordinary individuals and families, because such a surplus, as implied by their sumptuary activity, could have been produced as a consequence of a wealthy and armed elite oppressing the rest of the population who necessarily lived at a bare subsistence level. Evidence from the early centuries before and after the beginning of the Christian era is suggestive of small-scale contributions being of major importance for the material basis of Buddhism. V. Dehejia points to the sustained patronage received from the non-regal laity for the construction of stūpas and cave temples:

With a few exceptions, the artistic monuments produced in these kingdoms were not dependent on royal patronage. Stable political conditions apparently led to considerable economic prosperity, and surplus money seems to have accumulated in the hands of a wide section of the community. The patronage of the religious art was not the prerogative of the merchant and the banker. Apparently, the wealth necessary to indulge in such a luxury belonged also to persons of humbler professions like the ironmonger and stone mason, the gardener and the fisherman.⁶⁷

She provides ample evidence from epigraphy that many of the donors, leaving aside the large percentage of donor monks and nuns, were from people whose occupations would disqualify them from being brahmins or elite merchants. A similar conclusion can be drawn from a reading of the early literature, yet it must remain impressionistic as we possess no hard figures.

This whole question of a surplus shades off into the question of how monks could gain access to this surplus both at an institutional and at an individual level. It may not be too much of an exaggeration to see the Buddha (or is it really Ānanda?) as the first of the institutional fund-raisers. In this sphere of activity the method of raising resources could not have been based on any form of market exchange, though this need not mean competitive attitudes were not present. It is more accurate to use a prestatory model⁶⁸ in the sense that Buddhism may have provided an opportunity for those persons at various class and status levels within the urban environment to express and confirm their positions through ostentatious display in a way previously undertaken through the śrauta sacrifice, the performance of which was probably always beyond the reach of any but the most wealthy. The relative magnificence of donations was a method for establishing the divisions in a hierarchical elite. Only the wealthy could afford to have a monument built; only the wealthiest could afford the richest and most ornate designs. Changes in the composition of the classes which held economic power could be mirrored by variations in the style of their donations. The very fact that all parties participated 'meant that Buddhist institutions could perform a unifying role at the same time that they symbolized social and economic divisions',⁶⁹ and enables us to make some sense out of the huge donations to the saṅgha made by Anāthapiṇḍaka et al. which may have been no more or less legitimate than the offering of a bowl of rice to a wandering monk.

⁶⁷ V. Dehejia, 'The collective and popular basis of early Buddhist patronage: sacred monuments, 100BC-AD250', in B. Stoler Miller (ed.), The Powers of Art. Patronage in Indian Culture (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1992), p. 44.

⁶⁸ See ch. 11 below. ⁶⁹ Heitzman, 'Early Buddhism', p. 133.

Urbanization, urbanism and the development of large-scale political structures

Society and economy in the Buddhist texts are still dominated by a physical (and conceptual) landscape where the contrast between village and forest is pronounced in a geographical sense and not just in an ideological sense as it is in the Brāhmaṇa texts.¹ But it is much more than a question of village. The universal quality of landscape given by early Buddhist texts is that of urbanism, of cities sufficient in size to have harboured large populations who did not derive their income from agriculture. Such cities were surrounded by small villages and lots of open space, both wooded and cultivated. Buddhist monks did not have to make a decision between accepting urbanization as a process, the presence of large political states as a reality, or not accepting them. Both were realities when Buddhism developed. We presume they did not have an attitude to it as a process of landscape change and as a conceptual frame for particular forms of behaviour, because through their habitual touring the monks must have witnessed a wide variety of landscapes and forms of habitation. Not that all monks or nuns came from large towns or cities, but there was not a repressed memory of a sharp break between an urban and a non-urban landscape, even if there remained in both Buddhist and brāhmaṇical thought a sharp conceptual (and physical) distinction between village and forest. This distinction is considered important as it brings out the real significance of a group of wanderers locating themselves – forest/village, urban/rural countryside, village/trade route – simultaneously in several different areas, each having its own symbolic resonance. Further, it is an integral part of certain theories relating to the origins of Buddhism within its spatial context.

The question of urbanism, rather than urbanization, must be treated in any history of the socio-economic conditions associated with the rise of Buddhism, not just because it may have been contemporary with, or have just preceded, Buddhism's rise. In focusing on urbanism we are dealing with values rather than process, although we must inevitably also reflect on the process of social change accompanying the growth of the city in size and population. Both may be direct consequences of the change in political structures, though to assert distinct causality is difficult given the simultaneous arising of both phenomena. The differential features of the spatial landscape are well presented in the literature as places where Buddhist monks wandered and with which they had familiarity. But it is likely that from the time of the Buddha's life onwards the variability of social groupings associated with the variability of landscape was coming under the unifying and homogenizing tendencies associated with the pressures imposed by the newly arising states. He moved easily amongst political elites, of which group he himself had been a member. It is possible, and this is our view, that the Buddha offered the kind of teaching about the human condition that transcended any kind of spatial distinction between city and non-city, monarchical state and tribal confederacy, and that the universalism which was a concomitant of this helped legitimize the rising state by providing an ideology capable of transcending ethnic, tribal, social and linguistic differences. Such a universalistic teaching became a means of encoding in several interrelated layers the values of a socially and culturally heterogeneous state. From the centre an ideology of kingship and social coherence, centring on an absolute monarch, could be disseminated, an ideology which allowed the outlying tribes and states to retain a semblance of their cultural uniqueness. If this theory is correct then it has as a corollary that the particularistic values of the brahmins were inappropriate for the same task. Accordingly the tremendous feats of cultural codification we find in the Dharmasūtras, and especially in the Mahābhārata, must be seen as a recognition by the brahmins of the particularity of their values and an attempt to broaden them out.

¹ See C. Malamoud, 'Village et forêt dans l'idéologie de l'Inde brāhmaṇique', Archives Européennes de Sociologie, 17 (1976), pp. 3–20.

Intra-regional trade, finance, agriculture, division of labour, a diversified production base, a currency system, the idea of surplus and the ideological conditions required to give intellectual cohesion to all of these factors, are a sub-text of the entire Canon and appear incidentally everywhere. None of these could be present without urbanization.

THE URBAN SITUATION AT THE TIME OF THE BUDDHA AND LATER CENTURIES

An excellent broad summary of the state and character of urbanization between 550 and 400 BCE is offered by George Erdosy, working primarily from archaeological sources for the region containing Kauśambī:

Period II [in Kauśambī and dating from BC 550–400] shows an exceptionally high increase of size, and therefore rate of population growth, at .68 percent per annum, much of which is absorbed through agglomeration – the total occupied area changes from 35.8 to 100 hectares, but the number of sites grows only by five, to 21. Clearly we are witnessing rapid political and economic centralization: the concentration of population in sites clearly graded in size, the regular spacing of central places along all major arteries of communication, and the overwhelming dominance of the largest settlement all point to this . . .

. . . On the lowest rung of the ladder were villages, predominantly nucleated and inhabited by those practising agriculture and herding. Above them were minor centres which revealed traces of the manufacture of ceramics and lithic blades, as well as of iron-smelting, and to which marketing, policing and tax-collecting functions may also be attributed on the basis of the literary evidence. Next in the scale were towns providing a full complement of manufacturing activities, including the production of luxury items: unfinished beads of semi-precious stones and shells, as well as copper slag, were among the surface finds at such sites as Kara. Although several of these towns were fortified, they were dwarfed in size by the capital city of Kausambi which, in addition to possessing all the functions of smaller settlements, acted as the centre of political power.²

This spatial arrangement corresponds well with what Makkhan Lal has presented in his important work on proto-historic settlement patterns in the Kanpur region.³

The Pāli Canon does not so much chronicle the development of this situation as reflect its fully developed condition, but one can recognize a similar picture to that suggested by the archaeological evidence. The Buddhist literary sources speak as often of villages (gāma) as they do of large towns which are normally referred to by the name of the town, rather than by a generic term. From the texts we must assume the landscape was one where a few large cities existed, surrounded by many smaller villages, either providing services to the large city and/or subsisting from agricultural production, in between all of which must have been wasteland and jungle. Over the centuries this would have been progressively removed, though in the Buddha's time much seems to have remained. Chattopadhyaya is substantially correct when, writing of the impressions about the city derived from ancient Indian literature, he notes:

Literature thus gives two initial impressions about the city. As an apex centre, it is not at a distance from other settlements; in other words the essence of the city is in its centrality in the togetherness of settlements. Also, there is a graded hierarchy, ² Erdosy, 'City states', p. 107.

³ See for example his Settlement History and Rise of Civilization in Ganga-Yamuna Doab, from 1500 B.C. to 300 A.D. (B.R. Publishing, Delhi, 1984) and other works cited below.

between village, town and royal city, and not just a sharp distinction between the village and the city.⁴

Thus the physical distinction between town (city) and village should not be drawn too sharply, the conceptual opposition between urban area and forest/mountain remaining much stronger.

The Buddhist texts recognize a hierarchy of communities consisting of villages, towns, cities and countries.⁵ Terms used include gāma (village), nigama (country town), janapada (large community, country), nagara (town) and *puṭabhedana*⁶ (a market town). In the Jātakas, which represent a much later environment, there are references to dvāragāma (satellite villages) and pacchantagāma (frontier villages).⁷ The texts do show some inclination to classify the urban conurbations in several different ways: size, economic function, political status (border towns as opposed to capitals) and perhaps methods of internal governance (negama). Although the texts do not allow us any precision in determining the respective sizes of these kinds of urban arrangements, except that is for the difference between the cities and the small villages, it is clear that there was an acceptance of the landscape as it was. Whilst from the perspective of Vedic literature and archaeological data this was a new kind of built environment, the Pāli texts show no signs of its newness, but only of familiarity.

Buddhist canonical literature sets many or most of its stories in or near cities and villages, and in sum we are not given much more information about them than the names themselves. Any details are given in an entirely unsystematic manner. B. G. Gokhale has counted 1,009 references to various settlements, of which 842 are to just six cities – Sāvattihī, Rājgir, Kapilavatthu, Vesālī, Kauśambī and Campā.⁸ What became Benares must have also been a large city with many satellites – fitting the archaeological pattern –, if we go by the following reference from a Jātaka:

⁴ B. D. Chattopadhyaya, 'The city in early India: perspectives from texts', Studies in History, 13/2 NS (1997), p. 183.

⁵ D III, 37: gāma, nigama, nagara, janapada. A fuller discussion of these, complete with textual references, is given in Sarao, Urban Centres, pp. 36–47.

⁶ Kölver suggests it is a regional centre, a market town where an official breaks seals on goods for sale in controlled markets. See B. Kölver, 'Kautalyas Stadt als Handelzentrum: der Terminus puṭabhedana', ZDMG, 135 (1985), pp. 299–311.

⁷ A. Ray, Villages, Towns and Secular Buildings in Ancient India (Firma K. L. Mukhopadhyaya, Calcutta, 1964), pp. 26f.

⁸ B. G. Gokhale, 'Early Buddhism and the urban revolution', JIAS, 5/2 (1982), pp. 7–22, esp. p. 10. The figures for numbers of references are: 593 Sāvattihī, 140 Rājgir, 56 Kapilavatthu, 38 Vesālī, 15 Kosambī; 6 Campā. Distribution of places: 35 cities/towns, 8 market places, 45 villages, 3 countryside. Sāvattihī is so much represented because the Buddha is said to have spent 25 vassas there.

Not far from Benares was a village in which 500 carpenters lived. They would go up the river in a vessel and enter the forest, where they would shape beams and planks for house building and put together the framework of one-storey or two-storey houses, numbering all the pieces from the mainpost onwards; these then they brought down to the river bank and put them all aboard; then rowing down stream again, they would build houses to order.⁹

The number 500 is a formula meaning 'a lot', and is not evidence of anything, but, when we consider textual evidence for the spatial concentration of particular occupations, there must have been a large conurbation to sustain the services of a craft village like this. Moreover, this conurbation must have been increasing in size for a large number of carpenters to have remained gainfully employed.

However, these various fragments of evidence are scattered over many centuries. Apart from the naming of the six cities, none of the more economically advanced stages of urban life are mentioned in the earliest sources. Descriptions in the Jātakas are of no relevance to the pre-Mauryan period of Buddhism's growth. The same goes for Buddhist sculpture associated with early monuments which certainly presents an image of bustling city life with splendid buildings and throngs of well-dressed idlers. None of this is evidence of sophisticated urbanization as early as the fifth or fourth centuries BCE. Nonetheless archaeological evidence is highly suggestive that the six cities mentioned above, and some others, were fortified for military reasons and that they may also have doubled as administrative centres. The earliest dating of ramparts around cities that is now generally accepted is some time in the sixth century BCE; probably the earliest is Old Rājgir (New Rājgir dates from the second century).¹⁰ By 550 BCE, there were ramparts at various city sites, all identified as capitals of kingdoms: Atranjikhhera, Rājgir, Campā, Ujjain and Rājghat. By 400 Śrāvastī was added, and by 300 also Besnagar, Mathurā, Tripuri, Vesālī and Pāṭaliputra. Ghosh recognizes two periods of construction of city fortifications, the first beginning about 600 BCE and the later in the second century BCE, after the Mauryas.¹¹ These were both periods of severe political instability.

The few canonical descriptions of cities are conspicuous for their brevity. Here are some of the more substantial:

⁹ JII 18, 14.

¹⁰ Erdosy, 'Early historic cities', pp. 4–6; Erdosy points out that there is however no evidence to corroborate the association of Old Rājgir with the King Bimbisāra mentioned in Pāli texts; the date of this king cannot be regarded as a fixed point, given the doubt about when the Buddha lived.

¹¹ A. Ghosh, The City in Early Historical India (Institute of Advanced Study, Simla, 1973), pp. 11, 66.

Lord, this town of Kapilavatthu is rich, prosperous, populous, crowded with men, with congested thoroughfares. Now, Lord, when I entered Kapilavatthu at eventide after waiting upon the Blessed One, I met a wandering elephant, a wandering horse, a wandering chariot, a wandering cart and a wandering man.¹²

[Ānanda speaking to the Buddha,] ‘Let not the Blessed One die in this little town of mud huts, which is in the midst of the jungle, a minor town. For, Lord, there are other great cities, such as Campā, Rājagaha, Sāvatti, Sāketa, Kosambi, and Benares. Let the Blessed One die in one of them. In them there are many wealthy warriors, brahmins and householders who are well disposed towards the Tathāgata. They will honour the Tathāgata’s body.’

[The Buddha says no and praises Kusinārā where he intends to die:] ‘. . . This Kusinārā, Ānanda, was the royal city of King Mahāsudassana, under the name of Kusāvātī, and on the east and on the west it was twelve leagues in length, and on the north and on the south it was seven leagues in breadth.

That royal city Kusāvātī, Ānanda, was successful, prosperous, and full of people, crowded with men, and had good food. Just, Ānanda, as the royal city of the gods, Ālakamandā by name, is successful, prosperous, and full of people, crowded with the gods, and has good food, so, Ānanda, was the royal city Kusāvātī successful, prosperous, full of people, crowded with men and had good food.

Both by day and by night, Ānanda, the royal city Kusāvātī resounded with ten cries; that is to say, the noise of elephants, and the noise of horses, and the noise of chariots; the sounds of the drum, of the tabor, and of the lute; the sound of singing, and the sounds of the cymbal and of the gong; and tenthly, with the cry, “Eat, drink and chew”’.¹³

A later description given in the *Milindapañho*¹⁴ allows us to notice the rich texture of a much more fully developed city. Most of the description is taken up with the occupational types in the city, but the brief description of the architecture is of a large city containing defensive features, regal buildings, ponds, wells and bazaars. What is most conspicuous in the description are the various occupational categories. The groups of people listed are classified according to at least five separate categories: (1) the brāhmaṇical varṇas, (2) a diverse set of military roles, (3) occupations, trades and crafts one would expect to find in a large city, though not in a village, (4) people of different nationalities, and (5) people from different Indian cities and regions. Of these categories the third is, not unexpectedly, the largest. It comprises various classes of occupation necessary for providing the basics of life and adds to this others whose role is to produce luxury goods. The breadth of different categories and the range of occupations in category three could scarcely have been supported in a nucleated village economy.

¹² Summary of S V 369. We have followed the translation and amendments to the text of Bhikkhu Bodhi, The Connected Discourses of the Buddha: A New Translation of the Samyutta Nikāya (Wisdom Publications, Boston, 2000), vol. 11, pp. 1848, 1956 nn. 336–7.

¹³ D II 146–7. ¹⁴ The Milindapañho, ed. V. Trenckner (Luzac, London, 1962), pp. 330ff.

In addition, the range of military positions listed here would apply only to a standing army, not to an ad hoc militia cobbled together to fight off cattle rustlers.

What is absent from this list are farmers, pastoralists, financiers of the type made famous in Buddhist literature by the example of Anāthapiṇḍika, and large merchants. The absence of the first two is hardly surprising, but the other two are mentioned frequently as residents of large towns such as Sāvatti, Rājagaha or Benares.

TWO STAGES OF URBANIZATION

When we inspect the quality of the evidence category by category with an eye on its chronology, it is necessary to realize that even by the period 600–400 BCE, we do not yet confront convincing evidences of mature urbanization with the sorts of sophisticated technical developments we might expect, especially from sources like the Vinaya and some other parts of the canon. Several scholars have drawn attention to the absence of many of the features normally associated with urban civilization until relatively late. A. K. Sinha has pointed out that most of the features of full-fledged urbanization do not turn out (despite some earlier claims) to belong to the period before the fifth century BCE.¹⁵ R. S. Sharma identifies as a major stage of cultural progress the Mauryan period, when there were advances in the numbers of coins, iron tools and burned brick buildings, and the appearance of tiles and ring-wells.¹⁶ Erdosy speaks of a third-century boost in urbanization, with baked bricks, elaborate sanitation, town planning, monumental religious architecture, and writing.¹⁷ Niharranjan Ray, reminding us that Pāli literature is not useful as evidence for urbanization even for some centuries after the Buddha, argues that urbanization proper needs to be dated to the Mauryan period, built upon Nanda dynasty fourth-century foundations, as well as the probable impact of Hellenic culture mediated by Alexander's campaign.¹⁸

¹⁵ A. K. Sinha, 'The Historical Urbanization – a Suggestive Date', Purātattva, 11 (1979–80), pp. 151–5.

¹⁶ Sharma, Material Culture, pp. 105f. However, he also gives great weight to a major stage of urbanization in the sixth century BCE.

¹⁷ G. Erdosy, 'Early historic cities', p. 14. Erdosy identifies a phase of maturation in 500–300 BCE marked by technological flourishing – baked bricks, wells, drains, paved roads and religious monuments. See also G. Erdosy, 'Origins of cities in the Ganges valley', JESHO, 28 (1985), p. 96.

¹⁸ N. Ray, 'Technology and social change', Purātattva, 8 (1975–6), pp. 132–8. He discusses the archaeological sites at Rājgir, Benares, Śrāvastī and Vesālī to show that there is no evidence that in early times these places were actual cities, as opposed to settlements with big but primitive fortifications. Even Kauśambī exhibits no more advanced culture pre-dating the Mauryas, and a stone circular construction at Ujjain cannot alone make this site a city even if it is pre-Mauryan.

These positions converge upon the claim that advanced urbanization needs to be recognized in a variety of sophisticated cultural developments that did not in fact become important features of Ganges settlements until the rise of the Mauryan dynasty towards the end of the fourth century, or a little earlier. Such a claim implicitly identifies urbanization with aspects of material culture in some combination, not necessarily all regarded as necessary conditions – large settlement size, coinage, writing, large-scale application of iron manufacture to the economy, and so forth. Whatever may have been the combination of stimuli responsible for the rise of state and city in ancient India, it is clear that we should recognize two distinct stages.

In the first appear new larger communities representing much denser clusterings of people than before, living in central settlements where manpower is organized on a really large scale. For this to happen there must first be a major shift in the pattern of social relationships; settlements grow to a new and unprecedented size with a new hierarchical structure and a substantial degree of political centralization, instead of constantly splitting, with groups migrating elsewhere. This requires the rise of centralized political power: instead of being primus inter pares, a chieftain is able to subordinate surrounding groups to his own authority, employing his own livery to execute and enforce central decisions and engaging in various pre-statory and regal activities intended to demonstrate his own pre-eminence. These conditions appear to have been fulfilled by the rise of important centres by about the sixth century, each marked by a relatively very dense concentration of population in one place, bounded by a massive rampart, and linked by a network of commercial or administrative connections to a complex pattern of smaller settlements in the hinterland. These developments can be seen to have occurred substantially in advance of the second stage, one marked by the appearance of sophisticated material culture, with money, writing, major advances in architecture, and the use of iron tools in agriculture from the fourth century.

The succession of stages is masked by the fact that not all the technical advances of the second stage had to wait until then to be invented. Some (notably, iron manufacture) had been invented long before, some (such as written language) perhaps somewhat before, but they found their widespread application only then. Mature urbanization, with a growing economy and technical advance, involved not so much new inventions as the burgeoning of technologies whose time had come. Northern Black Polished Ware pottery began rather earlier, but came in its later stages, only from the fourth or later centuries, to be associated with major brick fortifications, drainage, coins, seals, and a big expansion of settlement size.¹⁹ The use of burned bricks in house construction is negligible before the third century BCE.

To whatever extent the process here recognized is typical, the clear sequence of stages comporting it, first political and then technical, is rich in implications for the process of state formation, to be considered in the second section of this chapter – it suggests that political change can come before social and economic change. It is therefore interesting to notice that in South East Asia, where sophisticated forms of economic and political organization eventually developed with the adoption of Sanskrit culture in the royal capitals, there was a similar earlier stage in which large settlements appeared ringed by ramparts. They appeared, for example, in northeastern Thailand,²⁰ and in eastern Cambodia many smaller earthworks with moats suggest the same thing.²¹ It appears that, in the prelude to the rise of Indian-style kingdoms in the region, there were chiefdoms with relatively advanced stages of political centralization and control of manpower, which had developed independently.²²

EARLY BUDDHISM IN ITS URBAN ENVIRONMENT

So far as any sort of chronological associations can be made, it is our view that the rise of Buddhism accompanied the beginnings of the second stage. What is clear, though, is that the canonical texts took shape as a whole somewhat later, when the full-fledged urban environment of the second stage was thoroughly familiar and taken for granted.

Most Buddhist countries have been basically agrarian, and an unreflective reading of the obvious facts of geography and Buddhist history might suggest that monks in early times would have been most at home in an agricultural environment. To be sure, there are references to agriculture which ¹⁹ A. King, 'Some archaeological problems regarding Gangetic culture', in K. A. R. Kennedy and Gregory L. Possehl (eds), Studies in the Archeology and Paleoanthropology of South Asia (Oxford and IBH Publishing Co., New Delhi, 1984), pp. 114ff. At Atrañjikhera the evidence is that the occupied area in the Painted Grey Ware phase was only about 1300 square metres, while in the subsequent Northern Black Polished phase it multiplied to about 850 × 550; it turned from a village into a town (Ghosh, City, p. 60). Burnt brick is securely attested in northern India only from late N.B.P. levels (ibid., pp. 68f.).

²⁰ E. Moore, Moated Sites in Early North East Thailand (British Archaeological Reports, Oxford, 1988).

²¹ See R. Mourer, 'Préhistoire du Cambodge', Archéologia, 23 (1988), p. 52.

²² Referring to such communities attested by early Chinese evidence for Indochina and Java, and archaeological sources for the middle Irrawaddy and the delta of the Mekong, P. Wheatley observed that 'it is in these pre- and protohistoric paramountcies that much of the dynamism of the so-called Hinduization process should be sought': P. Wheatley, 'Presidential address: India beyond the Ganges – desultory reflections on the origins of civilization in Southeast Asia', Journal of Asian Studies, 42/1 (1982), pp. 13–28.

are of interest to the social or economic historian. An exclusive emphasis upon the rural background, however, would mask a capital fact about the life and organizational culture of the early saṅgha. The monk was expected to move back and forth between the empty spaces, however remote, and the towns, however bustling and densely populated. The monks' stamping ground was not just the forest and not just the city; it was both, as references to Rājagaha tell us. Rājagaha was a large city dominated by a bureaucracy, a king and a military garrison, but it was also surrounded by wooded hills which would allow monks to escape if they wished.

The vihāra could be regarded as a compromise between the two. Textual evidence, confirmed in some measure by archaeological research, reveals that the great majority were built on the outskirts of villages, enabling the monk to practise a certain isolation within the monastery whilst viewing the life he has renounced when in the village or town. A monastery allows the monk to be both within and without, to coin a phrase. It also enables lay Buddhists to see the monks in their own environment, if, that is, we can draw this conclusion from Vin I 192 where people are described as touring around the dwelling places of monks and being critical of what they see.

If one reads the Nikāyas and the Vinaya extensively, one is struck by the few references dealing in extenso with city life. It is standard practice for the Buddha's delivery of individual suttas to be announced as having occurred at particular locations, often Sāvatti or Rājagaha. But the locations only form the spatial backdrop for the sermon and the references to the town or city end there. Allusion has already been made to statistical counts of the number of locations mentioned in the entire Canon and the frequency of the Buddha's visits to them.²³ This in itself is useful for giving us a rough indication of where the Buddha preferred to spend his time, but it does not reveal an attitude towards an abstract concept like urbanism or the process that is urbanization.

The time the early Buddhist monks spent in particular places can be summarized in respect of five spatial locations:

- (1) Temporary residence in large conurbations raising money, collecting alms and preaching the dhamma.
- (2) Travelling 'on tour' from one large city to another, often along trade routes.
- (3) Temporary residence in villages whilst on tour.
- (4) Life in monasteries on the outskirts of villages and large towns.
- (5) Wandering in uninhabited areas such as mountains and jungles.

²³ See Gokhale, 'Early Buddhism', p. 10. See above, p. 80.

We are not able to assess the respective time monks might have spent in these locations; in earlier times, it appears the monks and nuns spent the three months of the rainy season in monastic shelters, and in later times, with the process of 'domestication', settled monasticism became increasingly normal. The Buddha himself clearly spent much of his forty-five years after his attainment of nirvāṇa undertaking tours between the large cities, yet it is clear he also spent much time in Rājagaha and Sāvattihī, no doubt because he needed to be there to keep his finger on the pulse of political affairs and to raise material support for the saṅgha. We should not, however, assume the Buddha was the model for all other members of the saṅgha. At all times there must have been those who wandered about bringing publicity to the newly emergent religion, others who remained in one monastery and built up a network of influence in particular villages and still others, probably a minority, who isolated themselves in order to lead a solitary life.

Even if a given monk/nun were to spend time in villages or large conurbations, they still, nonetheless, located themselves primarily in a 'religious' environment by virtue of living on the outskirts of a village. We can be certain of this by the huge number of times a given sutta tells us that a certain monk went into/returned from a particular village before/after an alms round. Taking village/town and cultivated/uncultivated outskirts into account means that any geographical location must be considered the appropriate spatial location for the monk, an echo of which is given in a Vinaya passage where Rājagaha is said to be overcrowded with monks:

At that time the Lord spent the rains, the winter and the summer only in Rājagaha. People grumbled, took offence and became irritated, saying: 'The district is overcrowded with recluses, sons of the Sakyans, because of whom the area around can hardly be seen.' Monks heard these people who . . . spread it about. Then the monks told the Lord about this problem.

In response, we are told, the Buddha took a small number of monks to Dakkhiṇāgiri. He did not answer the critique but did lay down conditions whereby monks could live independently, presumably away from their own teachers.²⁴

Apart from the spatial locations of the Buddha and the early monks, there is also evidence pertaining to this subject which can be derived from the large number of non-Buddhists who inhabit the early texts. One estimate can be derived from figures collected by K. T. Sarao.²⁵ Of the total of members of the four varṇas mentioned in the Sutta and Vinaya Piṭakas the following figures pertaining to origin from urban, rural or unknown areas can be collated.

²⁴ Vin I 79–81. ²⁵ Sarao, Origin and Nature, p. 69.

Class	Urban	Rural	Unknown
brāhmaṇa	231	43	124
khattiya	671	8	21
vessa	101	7	6
lower classes	86	17	44

The sample is small, but these figures seem overwhelming in support of the conclusion that an urban environment was more central in the Buddhist texts than any other.

That this is so may be the reason why one of the most conspicuous features of the picture of social life given by Buddhist sources is the prominence of crafts and other miscellaneous occupations other than just herding or farming. We see a remarkably diversified economy, in which the monks find themselves constantly in contact with people following a huge variety of occupations. Further, it is notable that stories told for didactic purposes time and time again use homely similes that presuppose their hearers' familiarity with all manner of craft operations; the suggestion is that the dharma found itself specially at home among craftsmen. This surely is a point of some importance: crafts are referred to not by dead metaphors that might be presumed to have been part of everybody's active vocabulary (which is arguably the case with the agricultural metaphors), but with images carefully chosen to make the teaching clear. For example, in the Majjhima Nikāya, moral straightening out and edification are compared to the action of a wagon maker who shapes a felloe, shaping away its crookedness, 'its twist and notch, so that the felloe . . . might be clear and placed on the pith'.²⁶

URBANISM AND ISOLATION

In the discussion of the strong urban ambience depicted in early Buddhist literature what is significant is precisely that the transmitters of the dhamma should have represented the Buddha as a wanderer, constantly visiting the most important centres of power and wealth in spite of his concern with the peace best found in seclusion.

From the perspective of Buddhist teaching and monkish practice the framework for the Buddha's requirements given an urban environment is summarized by King Bimbisāra of Magadha, reflecting on a meeting with the Buddha:

²⁶ MI 31.

Now, where could the Lord stay that would be neither too far from a village nor too close, suitable for coming and going, accessible for people whenever they want, not crowded by day, having little noise at night, little sound, without a whiff of people, where a man can sleep alone, suitable for seclusion?²⁷

Hence monastic life and the location of monasteries on borders. Textual and archaeological evidence are in agreement that most monasteries were located on the border of the village or town and this is constantly reinforced by the references to monks entering into urban areas in order to go begging. The Buddha and his retinue are commonly depicted going from house to house and spending some part of the day, at least, in concourse with laypeople. The traffic goes both ways, with lay supporters coming into the monastery with supplies (as in modern times); in the Vinaya we find laypeople bringing oil, husked rice and solid food to the monastery, even in times of scarcity.²⁸

This, then, is what we learn, chiefly from the literary evidence, of life in the urban and commercial environment. Of course, the literary references reviewed (especially the Jātakas) come from sources unlikely to provide historical evidence of advanced urbanization in the earliest period of Buddhism, but the significance of such material here is simply that so much comes from Buddhist sources. What is remarkable is that the numerous casual allusions to the experience and knowledge to be expected in the city dweller are met in just the same contexts as allusions to the need for seclusion, the delights of the wilderness, and the incomparable states to be attained by the ascetic lost in private meditation. There is no clear separation of contexts representing different chronological layers. The Nikāyas, like other texts, were compiled by people familiar with the isolation of the forest and the hurly-burly of the market place. Like the holy men of other ages, they were wanderers who frequented the most cosmopolitan cities and the remotest hamlets. They lived in two worlds, which they were thus well placed to interpret to each other. That is the important lesson to be learned for the purposes of our enquiry.

STATE FORMATION

If urbanism within the context of early Buddhism has to be studied both as a process of environmental change and as a transformation in cultural and mental attitudes, so too does the development of political structures from the sixth to the fourth centuries BCE. They are implemented in a twofold way: in the extension of geographical boundaries and in the assimilation of prior social and political structures under the loose control of hereditary kings. If urbanism is one unstated context for the development and growth of the incipient Buddhist saṅgha, so too is the presence of large political formations in much of the area where Buddhism first took hold. Such formations consisted primarily of the states of Kośala and Magadha, and the political history during the Buddha's life is dominated by two processes: the conflict between the two expanding states and the continuing tendency of Magadha to threaten and eventually impose its will on the smaller settlements. Accepting that these tendencies, and the policies implementing them in a pragmatic sense, were givens during the life of the Buddha, and that the expansion of Magadha continued on after this, did they have a formative influence on the developing religion and what role could the activity of Buddhists have played in the role of governance associated with these states?

²⁷ Vin I 39. ²⁸ Vin I 211.

Both questions are relevant to the study of early Buddhism: on the one hand, according to the texts the Buddha was often in contact with Bimbisāra, King of Magadha, and with Pasenadi, King of Kosala, and on the other hand, if there was substantial dislocation in northeastern India during and after the Buddha's time it was caused by the on-going efforts of the Magadhan state to incorporate the many quasi-independent small groups that had existed in the area prior to the development of the large state-like formations. We are arguing that Buddhism offered a particular brand of transcendent teaching, performing some kind of ideological function enabling a corresponding political/social ideology to be used that transcended ethnic, tribal, social and linguistic differences. Allied to this, Buddhist teachings with their emphasis on individual effort and ethics offer a universalist teaching available for legitimizing what would otherwise have to be achieved ultimately by coercion or the socially divisive teachings of the brahmins.

CULTURE AND STATE FORMATION

Much of the scholarship on the connection between religion and social organization in ancient India is based upon the belief that social organization was shaped by ideas formulated by brahmins or other elite groups to serve their own material interests as a class. This assumption is methodologically inadequate. Here, we shall seek to improve upon an explanation of social and political change that appeals only to the calculus of purely material interest. We need to speculate in order to achieve some sort of working hypothesis which will provide a better framework for the discussion of religious change in the period of state formation. During the time of elementary state formation (600–400 BCE) communities were increasingly supported by agriculture and growing in population, and began to encroach upon each other. Conflict became endemic, as indeed it was to remain, on and off, throughout most of India's subsequent history. Some communities, favoured by superior weaponry or access to other valued resources, made themselves centres of patronage and protection for others. Attracting clients of various status and interests, they became centres of ritual and social activity, creating markets for goods from far away and providing minimal security, where none before had existed, for the growth of long-distance trade, which may have occurred even before the use of money. Leaders found themselves able to accumulate roles and responsibilities. The functions of garrison, market and ritual centre converged in centres of administration. Kingship evolved out of chieftainship.

This constitutes a bare hypothesis for the beginning of large-scale political formations which were characterized by an administrative/military capital city, an incipient bureaucracy, an impulse to territorial expansion and consolidation of prior political/social entities, protective measures to foster inter- and intra-regional trade and patronage of the most conspicuously successful religious groups. Such political groupings are ultimately backed up by whatever coercive powers the king can deploy, but some kind of ideology of kingship, as manifested over a large geographical area, was emerging and received expression in both Buddhist sources and later in both Sanskrit epics as well as the Arthaśāstra. But the idealistic and normative views they offer cannot in any sense be used as mirrors of what actually happened.

It is necessary to take account of the whole problem of group identification if we are to justify our opinion that one of the principal problems confronting the emerging large-scale kingdoms was that of dealing with groups all operating with different sets of factors causing identity formation. Such factors elicit some of the deeper springs of human nature, self-perception and social values. People feel loyalty to some groups, perhaps two, though scarcely to more, and can be induced to make sacrifices in a common cause with little or no coercion. Sometimes political circumstances change, creating new loyalties, and often to their own surprise people find themselves confronting former comrades as enemies.

One danger of proceeding along this path is in assuming Indian society in the Buddha's time was articulated in horizontal classes like those of modern industrial society, each class pursuing its own recognized group interests. We have argued against this view in the previous chapter, but some published writings, for example, tend to treat ancient Indian politics as if 'the brahmins' and 'the ksatriyas' were cohesive communities, competing or co-operating according to their perceived advantage; but we cannot know to what extent, or on what occasions, such generalizations capture the realities of motivation and behaviour. Much of the time, no doubt, particular brahmins and ksatriyas were driven by local or kin interests that were largely unaffected by any considerations of varṇa. Suppose that we knew as little about the later Muslim states (and their intense political intrigues) as we in fact know about the Buddha's time; with such sketchy knowledge we might seek to generalize about the political behaviour of 'the Hindus' and 'the Muslims', but we would be unable to catch any of the subtlety of the cross-cutting and constantly shifting categories that made up the networks of alliance and affinity, and governed the dynamics of political action in the Muslim period.²⁹

Let us propose the hypothesis that religion becomes dominant in certain crisis situations where people's group identities are dramatically challenged – in war, or when a political order is dissolved, or a social order is seriously threatened, especially where these had had very settled and conspicuous boundaries. In such circumstances people turn to their inherited religious ideas in order to know who they are, and their loyalties are redefined accordingly.³⁰ The extension of political and cultural influence outwards from rising states like Magadha and Kośāla must certainly have presented many people with just such a dramatic challenge. But who precisely were these 'people'? The historical record does not allow us to examine them in detail, for almost by definition they were non-literate communities on the fringes, capable of entering the light of history only to the extent that they found redefinition as parts of the larger expanding states, and the role of monks and brahmins in dealing with these people during the process of change is not charted.

²⁹ The complexity of cross-cutting and nesting categories defining strong group loyalties and political action is well brought out by Mary Searle-Chatterjee's study of 'Caste, religion and other identities', in M. Searle-Chatterjee and U. Sharma (eds.), Contextualising Caste: Post-Dumontian Approaches (Blackwell, Oxford, 1994), pp. 147–66. See p. 164, 'Sect, tribe, caste, class, language and regional origin may each provide a basis for solidarity, and even mobilisation.'

³⁰ The study of group identity in modern India just cited points to the importance of religion: 'When the religious label enters the situation, the numbers of deaths in the riots appear far greater, as if religion is a crucial differentiating identity,' ibid., p. 164. However, we cannot extrapolate from this period to early historical India. Cf. H. Kulke, 'THE RĀJASŪYA. A paradigm of early state formation', in A. W. Van Den Hoek, D. H. A. Kolff and M. S. Oort (eds.), Ritual, State and History in South Asia. Essays in Honour of J.C. Heesterman (E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1992), p. 196 who points out that early state formation probably occurred in India at a time when the performance of the śrauta rituals was at its height. His view is that such rituals 'not only reflected, but sometimes even influenced socio-political developments through their impact on "public" opinion'.

What is at stake here is the problem of 'ethnicity', a concept that is awkwardly named because, in the course of discussion, the term has lost touch with its origin. Groups often feel very strongly that they are united as a community or a people, but actual biological ancestry (even though it may be theoretically prominent among the concepts celebrated by the group), or even religion or language, may not provide any over-riding criterion for this unity.

What is perhaps lacking in the theoretical literature on ethnicity is a refined analysis of the role of cosmology, the beliefs people have about the order governing the universe, and the particular place which their own community has within this order. This subject will be touched on in a later chapter. What needs to be noticed here is the importance of the radical dissonance between cosmological ideas and life experiences that confronts people in periods of rapid change. When an urban culture expands and encroaches upon hinterland communities that have nothing much in common with it, and threatens their cultural integrity, the dissonance is maximal. What is then required is a new cosmology that can make sense of an otherwise intellectually incoherent universe. Such a system needs specialists; and these may in certain circumstances be ascetics, wanderers who in specific symbolic ways claim to have divested themselves of the entire habitus of their inherited cultures. If their status is generally accepted, these people can play a part in helping an outlying community to redefine itself in confrontation with an alien dominant culture which threatens people's ideas of who they are without initially offering any recognizable alternative. Thus they can play a part in the articulation of social relationships in the real world that is directly represented by the transcendental and soteriological values celebrated by their scriptures. This is the argument developed here.

STATE FORMATION IN NORTH-EAST INDIA: A WORKING HYPOTHESIS

Here we introduce a hypothetical description of the process of state formation in the Ganges valley and its environs. Into this process, religious developments fit naturally as interactive components with functions to perform in specific social situations: first the sort of ritual-dominated forms which the Vedic Brāhmaṇa texts typify, and at a later stage the ascetic forms represented by Buddhism and the śramaṇa schools. A warning should be given in advance that this description offers a picture which is much purer than what must have actually occurred. Given the deep concern of all the available literary sources with religion, any hypotheses about the change in political structures (of any size) can only ever be inference.

The description is generic and can apply to a wide range of possible situations. It is the dynamics of interaction that are abstracted to embody the hypothesis. Essentially, the proposal denies that a central political authority can arise only as a result of victory in violent conflict with those communities or institutions (villages, tribes, clans, guilds or janapadas) which, being subordinated, subsequently constitute the body of citizens. It denies, equally, that authority must be built upon a contract, however informal, between citizen communities and the central authority, offering obedience and services in return for protection.³¹

What happens is that, where a particular community is privileged above its fellow communities in the same broad cultural group by special access to desired goods, and if it maintains its edge over them in its own culture for long enough, these other communities may in the natural course of change accept ritually subordinate terms of association with it in order to obtain a share in the exploitation of the goods, rather than competing violently. This ritual subordination gradually turns into political subordination and the ritual eminence of the privileged community's leaders gradually turns into the exercise of political power with the natural growth of economic activity promoted by exploitation of the goods.

We can call the economic resources the field of exploitation; it can be any sort of resource-rich area, strategic position (on a pass or river mouth, for example), or subordinated alien population (such as farmers belonging to a different culture, subordinated by pastoralists with warrior skill and the use of the horse). The privileged community we can call the bridgehead community. This may obtain its privilege by luck, when it moves into a zone which turns out to offer economic advantages, or by adaptation in a marginal zone, taking advantage of the possibilities of its environment to add new resources to its repertoire (adding farming to pastoralism, or trade to both).

The bridgehead community has varying relationships of alliance and enmity with other communities which share the same culture; they have common myths, perhaps a common language, but are frequently in conflict. If the privileged group establishes a marked superiority in the control of manpower given it by its control of economic goods, these others may find it advantageous to link themselves politically to the bridgehead community rather than fight it, sharing in the benefits of taxing, looting, trading or otherwise benefiting from the zone of exploitation.

³¹ Cf. Kulke, 'RĀJASŪYA', p. 192, focusing on the newly emerging grāmin having to both coerce and attract the 'subjugated' residents of his village.

The process can operate in any number of situations. What matters in every case is that a particular community should experience a special advantage enabling it to establish pre-eminence among its fellows. The pre-eminence should be sufficient to deter the fellow communities from attempting direct competition and to induce them to accept a measure of subordination, and the duration of the situation should be sufficient to enable the bridgehead community to become the nucleus of a new political unit. As it grows, the smaller communities lose their ability to compete with it on equal terms. So long as there are visible benefits from sharing in the benefits of economic exploitation and, presumably, of the mere maintenance of the traditional status quo, they may co-operate with the rising centre, accepting their junior status.

But co-operation does not come naturally. People can adjust to a new political environment only by drawing upon existing cultural resources, which effectively perform a mediating function. This places heavy demands upon the various ritual institutions by which the larger group as a whole recognizes and celebrates its own unity and distinctness. Certain individuals symbolize the shared culture of the society by their birth, prowess or ritual office (or any combination of these), and they are able to command some degree of loyalty, if only on ceremonial occasions or in brokering military alliances. Their role in ritual relationships is therefore called upon to dampen resentments and stifle competition in the cause of the general good (sarvabhūtabhita?). With co-operation, it is felt, the fruits of exploitation may be adequate to please everybody.

Leaders can engage in activities calculated to magnify their fame, particularly the sponsoring of lavish ceremonial gatherings and the organization of labour for symbolic monumental construction. P. J. Wilson has stressed that, in organizing labour for such community activities, a chief is adding value to the labour by organizing it so as to gain a community benefit (such as the refertilization of the Earth by the performance of śrauta sacrifices) that could not otherwise be obtained; the construction of tombs in particular connects chiefly power with the presence of ancestors whose spiritual power thus comes to be available for the community.³² 'Architecture, ³² P. J. Wilson, The Domestication of the Human Species (Yale University Press, New Haven and London, 1989), pp. 90f., 133. For how this is applicable to the domesticated and socially evolved forms of Buddhism see G. Schopen, 'Burial ad sanctos and the physical presence of the Buddha in early Indian Buddhism: a study in the archeology of religions', Religion, 17 (1987), pp. 193–225 and P. Mus, India Seen from the East (Centre for South East Asian Studies, Clayton, Victoria, 1975).

especially funerary architecture, is ritual materialized and perfected.' Tombs are 'as near as mortals can get to incarnating absolute real power. Their building and existence testify to and legitimize the right of some people to be empowered by others so that they may assume all power, divine power.'³³

Hand in hand with the construction of these monuments must have gone the centralized organization of labour mobilized for such construction projects. The bureaucracy required for the planning of the constructions and the organization of the labour force must have been considerable. This, as well as the actual structure itself, was clearly a symbol of the king's power, a symbol effective to anybody who lived in the general area of the respective cities.

All forms of display may be exploited to magnify the ritual centre, with increasingly grand ceremonies designed to manifest the spiritual energy thought to imbue it. Feasts require the levying of more produce from affiliated communities; co-operation in the management or subjugation of other cultural groups requires more complex processes of discussion and policy execution. In such ways the activities of a chief would bring about a centralization of manpower that was originally ritual but had the potential for political reorganization.

Such activities are important in giving a raison d'être to the office of ruler, whose superiority is given firm foundations in the material world by the support of armed bands capable of levying tribute from lesser client communities in return for protection, especially if they are well armed with the best weapons. New types of activity at the ceremonial centre attract groups of hired craftsmen and retainers, and increasing market activity with a substantially wider range of consumption goods. Thus, step by step, a qualitatively new and centralized form of political authority associated with a larger settlement comes into being. Such an authority promotes the production of trade goods by extracting and redistributing a surplus; trade and political authority evolve together, each feeding the other. In this way a state can grow by stealth, gradually creeping up on its constituent groups, even while they cherish their autonomy.

The emphasis placed here upon ritual centres is, however, intended to depict only the preliminary stages of state formation, not its mature development. The ritual repertoire which can be drawn upon for changing self-perceptions of the communities involved during the transition to a state belongs to the culture of the old society which lacked effective political centralization. By the time a state's rulers are in a position to organize an apparatus of government capable of calling forth surpluses, generating urban architecture, and stimulating crafts and sciences, the state begins to demonstrate a much more secular character. Indeed, in the current state of archaeological knowledge ritual principles are not conspicuous in the layout of early urban sites, and massive funerary monuments do not dominate them.³⁴ The best examples of town planning dominated by ritual came from much later, even medieval, times. The role of ritual in state formation may nevertheless be plausibly hypothesized for an earlier stage, in which chiefs still dwelled in village settlements, and the processes of political integration had yet to advance. In India it makes more sense to recognize the heyday of the large public ritual as a phase at the very beginning of the elevation of chiefs to rulers, a view that Hindu texts confirm. After about 500 BCE only the large kingship rituals continued to be performed with anything like a regular frequency. But in this early phase, religion reflects a state of society that is ripe for the growth of a higher-order political authority, but in which, if other conditions are lacking, it may not proceed to maturity. This phase of elaborate ritual and of enhanced claims for ksatriya eminence thus lies just before the rise of the state. The evidence of the late Vedic sources fits this scheme rather well, and although the Vedic literature is not a focus in this study, we shall shortly turn back briefly to notice its significance.

³³ Wilson, Domestication, p. 130.

To the extent that the reality of the state's emergence is perceived by the exploiting culture in ritual terms, its legitimacy is cultural in the sense that it functions as a tool for communicating symbolically both to those at the centre of the culture and those on its fringes. This means there is no natural boundary, other than the boundary of the whole culture, defining the scope of a potential state. In India, emergent kings were automatically in competition with each other, for the raison d'être of each kingdom lay in the sense of cultural unity that linked the exploiting communities together. In practice the area of a state's rise was determined by the geography of competition. In the Ganges-Yamuna drainage area, the first steps towards state formation (unlike the later developments in Magadha and Kosala of the mid first millennium BCE) took place in upriver sites where a number of settlements enjoyed access to scattered iron deposits. However, if iron for weapons had anything to do with the story, no one part of the whole region was uniquely privileged.

³⁴ Certain men, especially holy men who had stepped outside the Vedic orthodoxy of the sacred fire and therefore could not be ritually cremated, were honoured by burial mounds, and this custom is clearly at work in the evolution of the mythology of the Buddha's funeral and the construction of stūpas.

Finally, it should be noted that the adequately successful integration of a number of communities into a proto-state is a process requiring a reorientation of world view. People draw upon the myths and rituals of common culture to represent to themselves the now more complex ordering of a changing world. But what when there is no common culture, or no culture perceived by those affected to be shared between them? Even if there are no alien communities in range at the beginning of the process, it is virtually inevitable that the activities of a growing state will encroach upon outlying communities unable to draw upon shared cultural motifs to allow the psychological transition to belonging in a larger society. From the point of view of the expanding state, these communities present a challenge to the state's own view of itself and the world. They may be seen as intrusive and potentially dangerous. No ritual manipulation of shared traditions is available to create an integrating framework. If alien cultures are to be absorbed within an expanding state, some quite different type of ideological scheme must come into play. As will appear in the second part of this book, this is where Buddhism had a particular role, while brahmanism served the needs of integration within the exploiting culture.

In the centuries surrounding the life of the Buddha the most convincing material evidence for this kind of process is found in the huge, possibly defensive, ramparts built around the earliest cities of northern India. The necessary construction activity could in some cases require the organized full-time labour of many thousands of men for months or years; it is on its own adequate evidence of the central direction of manpower and hence of the appearance of at least some degree of political centralization. The subject is therefore significant for the study of state formation in the Ganges valley.

The cities that grew in the north were generally characterized by perimeter constructions consisting of a wide moat and a rampart made from the moat excavation. Among the earliest ones, the largest was at Ujjain, which was sixty to seventy-five metres wide at its base, fourteen metres high, and more than five kilometres long.³⁵ It has been estimated that this rampart contains two million cubic metres of earth and probably required three and a half million man-days of work (or ten thousand men working for a year). This represents centralization of manpower on a huge scale, especially when we consider that the population of the city would not have been much more than 30,000.³⁶ The Kauśambī rampart I would have required the labour of 10,262 men for 150 days for its construction; Sisupalgarh's outer rampart needed 14,000 men for 150 days, Ujjain 34,666 men for 150 days.³⁷

³⁵ Erdosy, 'City states', p. 109 and 'Early historic cities', p. 7.

³⁶ Erdosy, 'Early historic cities', p. 7; cf. R. A. E. Coningham, 'Dark Age or continuum', in F. R. Allchin (ed.), The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995), pp. 67–71.

In the earlier centuries, ramparts had sloping sides (arguably not good against frontal attack); brick revetments reinforced them, and eventually brick walls made them more effective against assault. It may be a mistake to identify the earliest phase of rampart-building as defence construction.³⁸ Among the earlier fortified cities (about the sixth to fourth centuries), only Rājgir has a stone wall; others were of earth, only later topped by brick walls. It has been debated whether these ramparts made sense as military defences,³⁹ when they failed to offer vertical faces difficult to scale; some have argued that, on the other hand, they made little sense as flood protection since they often occur at sites on the inside of river bends, where flood danger is not great, but (especially in conjunction with the large moats created by their construction) made good perimeter defence lines.

Apart from the archaeological evidence pertaining to the development of particular cities implying a high degree of (probably) state organization, changes in ritual performances and the extent of warfare can be used as clues for helping us understand the development of the state in ancient India. The way of framing the social and political history of the first millennium BCE in India finds place for the elaboration of ritual religion in the period when political authority first began to be centralized, and for a religion based more strongly on ascetic practices and ideology in the period when states first expanded into hinterlands populated by sparse scattered communities lacking shared cultural traditions.

Here it is appropriate to look back at the ritualism of the phase when the state was in embryo. Initially the political authority was centred in Vedic chieftains, the ideological basis of their rule and their ritualization of the world by the medium of the śrauta sacrifice being the responsibility of brahmins. Some members of this group became ritual specialists and defined themselves as ārya in relation to other groups who existed outside of the ritual sphere or did not recognize the authority of the brahmins. The large-scale rituals, requiring up to eighteen priests for their performance, were usually paid for by wealthy warriors. They were lavish, spectacular affairs, easily capable of lending themselves to the practice of sumptuary display. Certainly the two main kingship rituals – the rājasūya and the āsvamedha – performed the instrumentalist function of legitimizing the king both within and without the territory he claimed to rule, but were also an opportunity to display his wealth. It was probably much easier to perform the latter in those cases where the territory to be covered was not too large, as the larger the territory the greater the cost of sending warriors to follow a horse wherever it went and the greater the likelihood of conflict with outlying groups. As for the other śrauta rituals we have only prescriptions for their performance, not descriptions of their actual conduct; hence we cannot assess their immediate effects on those who might have witnessed them.

³⁷ Coningham, 'Dark Age or continuum', pp. 67–71.

³⁸ F. R. Allchin, 'City and state formation in early historic South Asia, I' South Asian Studies, 5 (1989), pp. 3f.; King, 'Some archaeological problems', p. 114.

³⁹ Erdosy has discussed the problem of identifying the functions of the massive ramparts found round early city states, concluding that it is difficult to identify them confidently; he gives some weight to the possibility that they were symbolic structures, marking sacred space. See 'Early historic cities', p. 8.

Rituals celebrate the cultural motifs that different (potentially rival) groups have in common. Implicitly, they appeal to cultural unity as a way of avoiding excessive conflict, drawing boundaries and expressing claims in symbolic form. They represent aspirations when the reality is more elusive. The absence of any over-arching political authority capable of resolving conflict encourages the proliferation of ritual. The first stages in the rise of such an authority will make ritual all the more important as tensions increase; but as soon as central political authority is successfully established, this will diminish the social importance of rituals in the territory where it is effective.

Few though they are, there are in the Brāhmaṇas and the Upaniṣads various indications of the rising importance of chieftains who attracted the services of ritualists. Some stories in the Upaniṣads represent ṛṣi rulers, as patrons on a lavish scale, and deliberately exalt their wisdom, setting them even above the learned brahmins. For example, in Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad 2.1.1, the learned brahmin Gārgya offered to teach Ajātaśatru, Lord of Kāśī (who offered a thousand cows in return), about the nature of Brahma. However, Gārgya's characterization of Brahma is entirely unsatisfactory, and Ajātaśatru turns out to know better.

'Let me come to you as your pupil,' said Gārgya. 'Let me come to you as a pupil.' Ajātaśatru replied, 'Isn't it a reversal of the norm for a Brahmin to become the pupil of a Kṣatriya, thinking, "He will tell me the formulation of truth (brahman)?"' But I'll see to it that you perceive it clearly.⁴⁰

The same Upaniṣad sets the ṛṣi estate above that of the brahmin: Brahma existed before all things, but, being alone, 'he further created a superior form, the kṣatrahooḍ'.⁴¹ Such statements are not untypical. At many points the older Upaniṣads represent kṣatriyas not only as magnificent patrons with enormous wealth to bestow but also as repositories of wisdom.⁴² The intent seems to have been to depict the brahmin and the kṣatriya in a symbiotic relationship, a view further developed, but also questioned, in the two epics. Buddhism also, in its turn, recognized a formula for the varṇas which elevated kṣatriyas above brahmins. That brahmins themselves should do this clearly reflects the rise of rājans as important sources of patronage and attests the birth of the state from the womb of ritual within a dominant exploiting culture.

⁴⁰ BrhU. 2.1.14–15. Trans. in P. Olivelle, The Early Upanishads: annotated text and translation (Oxford University Press, New York, 1998), p. 65.

Janaka, Lord of Videha, once set out to perform a sacrifice at which he intended to give lavish gifts to the officiating priests. Brahmins from the Kuru and Pañcāla regions had flocked there for the occasion, and Janaka of Videha wanted to find out which of those Brahmins was the most learned in the Vedas. So he coralled a thousand cows; to the horns of each cow were tied ten pieces of gold.⁴³

The ritual exaltation of the figure of the chieftain stems not just from the ambition of particular chieftains but from the needs of the people in the communities which were scarcely yet integrated. It reaffirms the relationship of hierarchy and function operative between them, as well as symbolically communicating their cosmology. The ritual exaltation will not, by itself, make a state come into being; but if the conditions such as those outlined above are present, this may happen.

Initially, the only valid reasons that can be recognized for accepting the increased authority of a leader are ritual ones. Yet as the case of the Ganges valley clearly shows, there is no natural equilibrium guaranteed under this system. If what begins as a ceremonial centre survives long enough in an economically strategic zone, it may become a big city and a royal capital. But in this case the new political authority will elicit new patterns of economic exploitation (creating incentives for technical advance and extracting an agricultural surplus, for example). Expansion from a hub of prosperity may make the old social boundaries, and the rituals which expressed them, obsolete. No sooner is the job of the brahmins at the ritual centre complete than they are marginalized, for the expanding state quickly acquires component elements that cannot be moulded by the brahmins' ritual technology.

⁴¹ BrhU 1.4.11. ⁴² ChU 1.8–9; 5.3.7; 5.11.4f.; Kausitakī Upaniṣad 4.19.

⁴³ BrhU. 3.1.1. Trans. Olivelle, The Early Upaniṣads, pp. 75, 77.

The population subject to the bearers of the dominant exploiting culture may soon come to comport a majority of aliens,⁴⁴ and from the ruler's point of view these are at least as important as the structure of the state. If expansion provides economic space for all groups, and indeed encourages it by means of securing communication and trade routes, society becomes more fluid, boundaries are relaxed and large-scale ritual becomes less important. In the India of the second half of the first millennium BCE the large śrauta sacrifices became less frequently performed, while from that same period to the present day cheap household rituals have continued as a framework whereby brahmins could bring about adaptation to new cultural conditions via a form of ritual homogenization.

In concluding this section we note two articles in which H. Kulke laid the groundwork for a theory of formation of political units in the late Vedic period.⁴⁵ On the basis of a selection of late Vedic texts detailing the kāmyeṣṭi rituals and the rājasūya ritual, he demonstrated an increasing process of social stratification between the kṣatriyas who became possessors of villages (grāmins) and the viś – incorporating relatives, slaves and depressed labouring groups – who fell under the subjugation of these new kinds of landlords. The brahmins emerged as the group who would legitimize this new social structure through the performance of rituals and, presumably, by the telling of mythic narratives which would rehearse this new social structure. Thus the kṣatriyas and brahmins become an elite in a newly stratifying society and stand against the viś. He sees proto-states developing in the following way:

After having established himself as the uncontested chief of a village (grāmpati [sic], grāmin) and its viś population, he subdued several villages and their hinterland with its jana population thus becoming a svarāja, viz. a “self-ruler” or autocrat, of a rāṣṭra chiefdom. In the final stage of early state formation the chieftains (rājā) tried to subdue other rājās in order to become an overlord of these rājās (rājñām adhirāja). These different stages of early state formation can be, at least partly, recognized in the Vedic royal consecration rituals.⁴⁶

Kulke's arguments are convincing and certainly provide signposts for further research, but in the final analysis do not detail the transition from a ṣatriya ruling over several villages and the emergence and growth of large states like Kośala and Magadha. In the present book these states are assumed. Indeed, the sources scarcely allow any detailed chronicling of the rise of these states; such a chronicling will not be attempted here.

⁴⁴ As was perhaps recognized by Bareau, ‘Le Bouddha et les rois’, p. 19: ‘The Magadhans were undoubtedly aryanised at a more recent date and, therefore, more superficially than the Kośalans and the Kāśis. The autochthonous elements of the population were undoubtedly proportionally more numerous amongst them than they were amongst these other two peoples.’

⁴⁵ Kulke, ‘RĀJASŪYA’; H. Kulke, ‘Grāmakāma – “das verlangen nach einem Dorf”’. Überlegungen zum Beginn frühstaatlicher Entwicklung im vedischen Indien, Saeculum, 42 (1991), pp. 111–28.

⁴⁶ Kulke, ‘RĀJASŪYA’, p. 190.

WARFARE AND INSTABILITY IN THE EARLY INDIAN STATE

States began to grow at a number of places in the middle reaches of the Ganges, and although they were initially far enough apart to allow the process of state formation to advance to a certain extent, it was not until most of them had been subsequently subordinated by the most powerful (by the third century BCE, if not the fourth) that expansiveness and pluralism came to characterize court culture, a culture constantly alluded to in both the Canon and the two Sanskrit epics. But even these conditions were consistent with large-scale warfare, armies being sent campaigning far afield. Warfare was endemic, then as in later history. And whilst Buddhist sources cannot be treated as secure evidence for conditions at the time of the Buddha, they appear to reflect a period of multi-state competition before the Mauryan ascendancy.⁴⁷ They attest that war or preparations for war were a normal part of life.⁴⁸ After the Mauryas, we have testimony from the Jātakas to chronic instability, punctuated by war uprisings and pillaging in border areas.⁴⁹

The scale of war, given the centralized control of manpower and organization, probably promoted enormous disruption to normal life, though this can only be inferred from the literary sources. We cannot, however, ignore the much-quoted inscription where Aśoka laments the enormous slaughter entailed by his conquest of Kalinga, after which he claims to have abjured conquest by arms.⁵⁰ Aśoka's figures are of course conventional hyperbole, but the scale and complexity of warfare in its impact on society are reflected by the growing elaboration of military weaponry, strategy, tactics, logistics and commissariat. Armies contain elephant riders, cavalry, charioteers, archers, standard bearers, billeting officers, supply corps and others including perhaps specially detailed disposers of corpses and camp followers.⁵¹ The importance of warfare as a normal department of kingly activity is made conspicuous in the AŚ, where it occupies a substantial part of the content of the work.⁵²

⁴⁷ Cf. Bareau, 'Le Buddha et les rois', p. 19: 'The memory of the struggles between the Kośalans and the Kāśis therefore remained alive, but in the time of the Buddha the second had, at all appearances, been definitively defeated and conquered by the first.'

⁴⁸ M III 7f.; D II 86. ⁴⁹ Eg. J II 217; I 409, 437; II 74. See also Fick, Soziale Gliederung, pp. 69ff.

⁵⁰ Rock Edict XIII; and see J. Bloch, Les Inscriptions d'Asoka, traduites et commentées (Société d'édition 'Les belles Lettres', Paris, 1950), p. 150. According to this inscription 150,000 people were displaced, over 100,000 were killed on the battlefield, and many more died as a result of war.

What calls for attention here is the striking fact, demanding some sort of explanation, that warfare was embedded in Indian culture as a natural condition of life. To be a king was to be a kṣatriya. Kṣatriyas, like other varṇas, were theoretically a hereditary class, but reality was accommodated by certain śāstric texts which acknowledged that, 'When one who is a non-kṣatriya does the work of a kṣatriya, he should do all this [that is prescribed for a king], in view of the principle that by taking on the function of a particular person or thing one receives the dharma of the other.'⁵³ The Nandas were technically supposed to have been śūdras, and the Śunga dynasty which firmly supplanted the Mauryas was founded by a brahmin. In later times, dynasties founded by people recognized as śūdras cropped up more often than the theory of the varṇas would lead one to think.⁵⁴ As is clear enough, the recognition of dynasties of non-kṣatriya origin as having kṣatriya status typically reflects the acceptance of realities of power created by the rise of rebels or bandit leaders, over any inherited social conditions.

To discover the ultimate reasons why India should have experienced such a high degree of disruption and militarization would require a major study of a type which cannot be undertaken here. It is likely that part of the explanation lies in India's openness to invasion through the passes of the northwest. Here, over the centuries, wave after wave of aggressive aliens pressed in. Their incursions set up ripple effects which destabilized power balances and provoked conflict over much of India. Endemic warfare was built into the institutions of Indian society from a very early period and is alluded to often in both Hindu and Buddhist sources as well as being discussed in a theoretical sense in the AŚ. The AŚ may look like an exercise in outrageous cynicism, but it takes its place in its own context as a practical manual of politics. Renaissance Italy was torn apart politically in much the same way: no enduring internal empire could develop to the point of paramount power, presiding over a stable arena of states, because Italy was made the plaything of great-power ambitions. It is no coincidence

⁵¹ See Wagle, Society, pp. 143ff.

⁵² The AŚ contains fourteen substantial books, of which numbers 7, 9, 10, 12, 13 and 14, plus part of 8, are devoted to warfare.

⁵³ Aparārka on Yājñavalkyasmṛti 1.366. Similarly, Medhātithi, commenting much later on Manusmṛti, 4.84, declared that whoever performs the function of king should be called a king. Cited by R. Bajpai, Society in the 7th Century (Chand, Delhi, 1992), p. 19, n. 190.

⁵⁴ Numerous examples are given in Bajpai, Society.

that Machiavelli, the Italian Kautilya, arose to map out a similar science of statecraft.

It is easy to see how this chronic instability may have affected the way Indian politics evolved, inhibiting the development of stable cultural units within which political centres could preside over other emerging centres of power. People recognize themselves as part of an encompassing community if over time that community maintains a stable unity underwritten by institutions of language, belief and economic interaction. The growth of such a community consciousness requires a recognized dominant set of traditions embodied in an elite which can be emulated by the rest of the population. In the long run intermarriage and changes of custom, with the adoption of common language, origin myths, legends, rituals and belief systems, will promote homogenization around the culture of this elite. The consolidation of the dominance of an elite in its earlier stages requires to be supported by enduring political power, because the development of a large-scale political unit requires a stable political centre.

But political centres were not stable. Even where the name of a dynasty was perpetuated for many generations, in-fighting at court and simmering conflict around the frontiers thwarted the evolution of a large-scale empire within any very large territorial unit. Clients of great men were liable to dispossession when their masters foundered, and dominant elite strata were constantly liable to lose political eminence. It is likely, therefore, that the power centres around which large homogeneous communities might have grown did not last long enough.

In these circumstances, it is perhaps not surprising if the class of brahmins came to play, in some respects, the role which a politically dominant elite could not, and in Indian history this role became institutionalized to such an extent that it acquired its own momentum. Society was permanently atomized, each local varga functioning as a miniature 'state' and looking for protection to whatever lord in the vicinity might be able to afford temporary protection. Meanwhile, the crystallization of cultural identity, lacking any enduring focus of political power, came to be centred upon the ritual and cultural elite – the brahmins, who had always been the mediators of high culture.⁵⁵ Political and ritual hierarchies came to be awkwardly conflated; people adapted cultural identities for themselves in the world by using a map supplied by brāhmaṇical lore or tribal lore, not by a centralizing political force. Notions of ritual hierarchy, based on the axis of purity and pollution, were forcibly superimposed upon notions of place in the local power structure. Brāhmaṇical religion, with its infusion of devotional practices, aligned with the world view of insecure and highly self-conscious groups, in a situation which favoured the entrenchment of religious traditions appealing to personal gods and focused on ritual.

⁵⁵ R. Kahane, 'Priesthood and social change: the case of the brahmins', Religion, 11 (1981), pp. 353–66, argues that the religious values of the brahmins gave them their social role: 'In a highly diversified society, such as that of India, in which groups are institutionally separated from one another, a special mechanism is required to unify them. Since it is likely that the "this-worldly" values will be different for each group, it is the "other-worldly" transcendent values which can unite the entire collective.'

L. Dumont has described the abstract structure of this social order for us in his classic study;⁵⁶ what has been lacking is an explanation of the concrete historical circumstances through which such an order first acquired its raison d'être, so unlike that of other agrarian social orders, and its massive authority which has given it a longevity greater than any raj. Of course the suggestions just advanced here necessarily raise more questions than they answer, but they may help point us in the right direction.

These observations have a direct relevance to the subject of the Buddha's social role. In its early social forms, Buddhist teachers were offering an ascetic message during a period of expansion characterized by interaction between encroaching state power and local communities who could not recognize themselves as in any sense 'Aryan' and were unable to assimilate themselves easily to the encroaching culture. This sort of interaction was a transient phenomenon of the relationship between expanding states and the fringes of Ārya civilization. The brāhmaṇical social order, on the other hand, was fed by an opposite situation: paradoxically, it derived its considerable stability and longevity from the constantly fractured unity of a political order bred of endemic warfare. The brahmins were the ritual specialists who were needed to provide a cosmology for the self-perceptions of ill-integrated groups who recognized themselves as culturally Aryan in some sense but were unable to find definition within a secure and durable political community. Thus the caste system, in its classical form, was bred of instability, of the enduring tension between aspiring large-scale political structures and small face-to-face communities.⁵⁷ In the long run, fracturing and political realignment were more characteristic of Indian history than the expansion of unitary states, and the schizoid politico-ritual social order of the brahmins was destined to prevail.

⁵⁶ L. Dumont, Homo Hierarchicus (Paladin, London, 1966).

⁵⁷ A tension of this kind is identified as a factor of the caste system by Declan Quigley: 'The common structure underlying caste systems is rather to be found in constraints given by kinship on the one hand and kingship on the other, both of which are set against a particular material backdrop which allows a territorially limited kind of centralization to develop.' 'Is a theory of caste still possible?', in M. Searle-Chatterjee and U. Sharma (eds), Contextualising Caste: post-Dumontian approaches (Blackwell, Oxford and Sociological Review, Cambridge, Mass., 1994), p. 42.

The kind of teachings offered by the Buddha to kings is clearly independent of any class considerations in the way it is presented to us in the texts. This must be regarded as its principal claim to neutrality. A teaching on diligence (appamāda) taken from the Samyatta Nikāya is illustrative. The Buddha is depicted in discourse with King Pasenadi of Kosala and reproduces a teaching the Buddha made to Ānanda, where the former says,

In truth the whole of this life of celibacy consists of friendship with auspicious people, association with auspicious people and intimacy with auspicious people. Of that monk who is a friend of auspicious people, who is an associate of auspicious people and who is an intimate of auspicious people, there will be the cultivation of the noble eight-limbed path, there will be an enlarged exposition of the noble eight-limbed path.⁵⁸

But this is inappropriate for a king and so the Buddha recommends the cultivation of the three forms of association with the auspicious person and recommends this be applied in respect of appamāda. He says, 'You must live on one single basis: diligence in respect of all good things'.⁵⁹ This will, the Buddha says, bring praise from the court ladies, his warrior dependants, his army, and those who live in towns and the countryside, all of whom will say, 'This diligent king lives basing himself on diligence' (SI 89), with the final result that he himself, the house of his women, his treasury and storehouses will be guarded and protected. The generality of this teaching gives it universal value and enables it to be translated into various levels to accommodate people of various levels of economic development and access to political power.

⁵⁸ SI 87–8.

⁵⁹ SI 89 eko dhammo upanissaya vihātabbo apamādo kusalesu dhammesu.

Brahmins and other competitors

In some senses, no doubt, Buddhism is a coherent and self-contained object of study; but for historical purposes it is essential to place it within a context supplied by brahmanism. The two are not totally independent entities; they belong together, in a complex and ambivalent relationship, as aspects of Sanskrit civilization. It is misleading to create the impression of a monolithic civilization centred on the use of the Sanskrit language, though it remains respectable to argue for the centrality of values expressed most prominently in Sanskrit literature as providing a kind of filter through which cultural motifs passed to constitute the repertoire of the Great Tradition. Possibly this notion of core culture as a compilation is unduly influenced by the analogy of the case of the Mahābhārata, which grew by accumulation; but if so we must still ask what role the urban state played in the nurturing both of Sanskritic values and of intellectual movements that reacted against them.

It is within this framework that we can legitimately see in the teaching of śramaṇas like the Buddha a systematic critique of the brāhmaṇical programme. The brahmin goal of penetration to sacred truth by spiritual cultivation was heartily commended, but the perceived exclusivism and moral bankruptcy of worldly brahmins, clinging to ritual formulae to justify themselves, was rejected; and this rejection was a means of appealing to all those in society who had their own reasons for resisting the claims of brahmins to have a monopoly on access to sacred power or the means of religious legitimation of secular power.

It is a truism, familiar in the anthropology of Buddhist societies in modern times, that ordinary villagers do not understand the inwardness of the nirvāṇa and the anātmān doctrines and do not bother themselves with them, however important they may be in some philosophical sense. Southwold, studying village Buddhism in Sri Lanka, observed that only the middle classes had any real attitude towards nirvāṇa, namely, an attitude of repugnance; as far as villagers are concerned, nirvāṇa is very remote and irrelevant. 'We might perhaps say that village Buddhists are protected from not wanting Nirvana by being taught that they are in no danger of getting it.'¹ Spiro, studying Burma, writes: 'Although almost every villager whom I interviewed had learned about anatta, less than two percent knew the meaning of this term.'²

It therefore becomes a puzzle how such doctrines can have had sufficient popular appeal to gain the support they did. The puzzle disappears when we visualize a zone – the north-east of India, with its frontier society and ambitious city-based rulers – in which a form of ideological underpinning specifically bound to the unique claims of Vedic myth was likely to seem counter-productive in any kingdom where multiple races, languages and traditions, mutually alien until yesterday, had to be welded into one. As Collins observes about the 'non-self' concept, the negative Buddhist teaching 'preserves the identity and integrity of Buddhism as an Indian system separate from brahminism'.³ Thus a metaphysical point serves to introduce our discussion of the relationship between Buddhism and the brāhmaṇical orthodoxy; the Buddha was not a student of the Vedic scriptures, but he knew enough about brāhmaṇical teachings to construct a system that in many ways was the opposite of them.

The common view of the status of the brahmin in its Buddhist depiction in the Pāli Canon has been predicated on the oppositional relationship between the Buddha and the brahmins. This reflects a view that both were competitors for souls, and that the principal form of attack on the Buddha's part was to question strongly the social pretensions of the brahmins and the metaphysical claims they adduced in support of their status.⁴ If the relationship really was an oppositional one we need to explore, with much more sensitivity than has hitherto been applied, the actual dynamics of this opposition, whether it was regarded as being oppositional by both sides and, as a corollary of this, why both groups revealed a need to market themselves in an aggressive manner, if, indeed, this is the correct way to characterize this aspect of their activity. By marketing we understand the deliberate application of a panoply of techniques to parade, in an intentionally persuasive manner, the ideology each group claimed to embody and its corresponding lifestyle. If this really was marketing, and implied a backdrop of competition such as we in the contemporary West associate directly

¹ M. Southwold, Buddhism in Life: the anthropological study of religion and the Sinhalese practice of Buddhism (Manchester University Press, Manchester, 1983), p. 203.

² M. Spiro, 'Buddhism and economic action in Burma', American Anthropologist, 68 (1966), p. 1163.

³ Collins, Selfless Persons, p. 183.

⁴ For an axiomatic statement of this opposition see Chakravarti, Social Dimensions, p. 42.

with the whole culture surrounding marketing, was it really a question of gaining and applying a form of power, capable of influencing deep values and of shaping cultures, that was in play here? Was it seen as something that could slip from the hands of its possessors into those of another group adjudged as manifesting 'religious status' of a kind conducive to mobilizing economic or other resources? Why did either group want status if it was not for economic or political reasons? Can we conceive of other reasons in the ancient Indian historical milieu which would explain a desire for power?

Scholarly opinion on this subject is further predicated upon the high-status position of the brahmins in relation to the Buddha and other monks who were marked as existing in (a) another space outside of the social structure circumscribed by the brahmins, or (b) in the khattiya class and therefore located within the former social structure. The first of these is usually held to embrace the position of the samaṇa, often regarded as the appropriate opposition in a conceptual space occupied by those social categories most clearly defined by a particular mode of practising religion and making it the centre of all values. It includes a ragbag of non-brāhmaṇical ascetics. However, to restrict oneself only to this aspect of the question means that one narrow referent is being retrospectively allowed to define the activities of these classes, even when their socio-cultural functions were probably much wider. Defining them only, or even substantially, in religious terms will result in a neglect or concealment of other aspects of their positioning within society and culture.

All the questions associated with the oppositional relationship between the Buddha and the brahmins need to be reformulated in another way to take into account the massive success both groups achieved in their capacity to flourish on Indian soil. We should ask whether in their portrayal in the Pāli Canon both groups emerge as direct products of their culture or were simply passengers mirroring and confirming the dominant trends of their time in such a way as not to threaten these, but to accommodate themselves to ever changing conditions. It is, of course, exceedingly difficult to expect any kind of precise answer to these questions from the narratives the texts make available to us. Above all they do have as a basic frame a context of antagonism and repeat this ad infinitum, always muting the antagonism between the Buddha and a given brahmin by also locating it within a conversion frame. Moreover, the manifestations of the success of the respective religions are surely as different as the different positions their representatives have always held in Indian society. The brahmins have as much a social significance as they do a religious significance, and they cannot be defined exclusively in terms of either. Their ability to act as the cultural vanguard of the socio-economic and religious system which has long guaranteed them a place at the pinnacle of society, and which has ensured their survival as the embodiment of that particular image in Indian society which other groups sought to emulate or trenchantly criticize, is the most evident sign of their success. Witzel has shown on the evidence of late Vedic literature that the eastern kings recognized the status of the brahmins and imported them to their own kingdoms, perhaps as a sign of status. *It is important to note that the eastern "kings", both of Kosala and of Videha, adopt western schools as their new Vedic śākhās, and not the central North Indian (Taittirīya, Śātyāyani-Jaiminīya, Kauṣītaki).*⁵

An initial signpost for the study of the portrayal of the brahmins in early Buddhist literature is provided in an important article by R. Tsuchida. He takes much more seriously than hitherto the need to define the brahmin simply as a religious specialist. He writes:

In a number of modern publications on early Buddhism the Buddha's antagonism toward or disrespect for the Brahmanical tradition is simply taken for granted, as if in the Buddha's mind that tradition amounted to little more than mere rubbish to be discarded by his followers. Such an assumption derives mostly from a partial and inadequate comprehension of the Brahminhood, in which one mere aspect of it is regarded as representative of the whole. For example, the practice of the animal sacrifice seems to have acquired such a preponderance in the minds of many scholars, when they speak about the Brahmanical tradition in relation to the Buddha's teaching, that they fail to pay enough attention to several other aspects of Brahmanical religion at the time of the rise of Buddhism . . . In reality, the practice of śrauta-sacrifices including animal rites, was by no means obligatory for every socially important brahmin.⁶

It is true that the killing of animals in the śrauta sacrifices is widely condemned in parts of the Suttanipāta and the Jātakas, leading D. D. Kosambi to speculate whether this was because of the Buddha's fear about the amount of livestock habitually wasted in this practice. It is equally true that the oblations offered in many rituals mentioned in Buddhist texts were vegetable offerings. But even these correctives are mere trifles. It is the presumption that the basis of the difference between the two had to be substantially a religious one that lies at the heart of our concern.

⁵ See Witzel, 'The development of the Vedic canon and its schools: the social and political milieu', in M. Witzel (ed.), Inside the Texts. Beyond the Texts (Harvard Oriental Series, Opera Minora 2, Cambridge, Mass., 1997), p. 312, Cf. p. 313: 'In line with Sanskritization as a means of raising the status of local chiefs, the extensive materials in the late Vedic eastern texts regarding the "coronation" (abhiseka) of kings (AB 8.5) must be considered.'

⁶ R. Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins', pp. 51-2.

At the same time it is equally true that in many Buddhist texts the interaction of the Buddha with prominent brahmins forms the subject of a large quantity of suttas. This is especially marked in the second and third volumes of the Majjhima Nikāya and also in the first volume of the Dīgha Nikāya.⁷ Not only do these texts contain considerable material about doctrine, the refutation of false views, descriptions of meditational states and guidance leading towards the achievement of mindfulness, they also contain much material that can be mined for sociological purposes. In this sociological material the dominant emerging theme is the jostling for status between brahmins and Buddhists on the one hand and between the Buddha and other groups on the other hand. This should not necessarily be taken as antagonism. But it is competition. We do not find significant tension expressed in the texts between the Buddhists and other classes classified, by whatever means, as lower than the brahmin. This is clearly noteworthy in placing some meat on the thesis that Buddhism was primarily a movement of elites, but equally it may be a consequence of the fact that only the historical memories of those who had control of literacy and textual transmission survived.

Frequently in the Buddhist canonical literature, the terms brāhmaṇa and śramaṇa occur as a compound, brāhmaṇaśramaṇa, making it clear that the two categories belonged naturally together.⁸ We have seen elsewhere that Buddhist monks were often designated with the Pāli equivalent samaṇa. The pairing occurs in Aśokan inscriptions.⁹ Commonly in the Pāli texts the use of the compound suggests that the two categories together form a homogeneous class for the purpose of some generalizations, so that the sense could be something like 'experts in sacred knowledge'. There is some evidence that the life of the śramaṇa was originally sometimes thought to be appropriate only for brahmins, and the compound śramaṇabrāhmaṇa could on occasion mean 'a brāhmaṇa who is a śramaṇa'; but equally the frequent criticism of brahmins and the constant opposition announced between the lives and values of brahmins and the teaching of the Buddha make it clear that the relationship was also thought of as an opposition. That this was not just a Buddhist prejudice is apparent from Patañjali's treatment of the compound brāhmaṇaśramaṇa as an example of an oppositional dvandva compound.¹⁰

⁷ Once again this raises the problem of how narrow it is to study Buddhism simply on the basis of the figure of the Buddha alone. It is a truism to say that he lies at the centre of most Buddhist narratives, but this means we may simply end up with a study of how certain elite figures competed with each other to achieve superiority in certain areas of life.

⁸ See V. Fausbøll, Sutta Nipāta (Sacred Books of the East, Oxford, 1881), vol. x, p. xii, which contains a list of places where the two are mentioned together. See also Sn. p. 15 prose; p. 19 vs. 110; p. 22 vs. 129–30; p. 32 prose; p. 33 vs. 191–2; p. 48 prose, p. 76 vs. 443; p. 91 prose, etc.; DhP (P.T.S. edn) p. 21 lists together brāhmaṇo, samaṇo and bhikkhu.

⁹ At many places in the Rock Edicts (e.g. Girnar R. E. XIII line 3) Aśoka preaches respect for brāhmaṇas and śramaṇas. See also Collins, Selfless Persons, p. 270, n. 7.

THE QUESTION OF THE BRAHMIN'S ELITE STATUS

To understand the source of the brahmins' prestige and power even in the Buddha's time, we can go no further than Milner's highly incisive perception that:

Their [the brahmins'] genius, though, was to avoid making the control of land and labour, or the control of force – the two are intimately related in agrarian societies – the primary basis of their power. These resources are the most alienable and easily appropriated by outside conquerors or upstart discontents, and in India's long and complex history frequently were; in contrast, a highly elaborate lifestyle, emphasizing ritual purity, among other things, was nearly impossible for outsiders to copy or appropriate.

The Brahmins had another genius: they rejected the notion that ritual purity required renunciation and lifelong otherworldliness.¹¹

This position is both highly problematic and suggestive at the same time. If we take into consideration the evidence derived from the Pāli sources it is clear many brahmins were attached in a very real sense to material possessions in their capacity as property owners. In his study of eleven brahmins who figure prominently in certain Pāli texts Tsuchida shows convincingly that such figures were well known as landowners and farmers. Of course, this was not the whole story, nor was it the only source of their prestige in society:

. . . the group of wealthy Brahmin-householders (lists 1–2) and that of eminent scholars of the three Vedas (list 3), although not quite identical, overlap to a considerable extent. This fact indicates the existence of a special class of Vedic masters living as Brahmin-landlords, who exerted great influence over the society both as cultural authorities and as agents of economic power. It is precisely this class of affluent Vedic masters to which most of the important Brahmin-figures in the canonical narratives seem to belong.¹²

¹⁰ Mahābhāṣya, II 4 9 (ed. F. Kielhorn, 1880, vol. 1, p. 476 line 9). The dvandva compound śramaṇabrāhmaṇa appears as an example of virodha.

¹¹ Milner, Status and Sacredness, pp. 68–9.

¹² Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins', p. 65. Much earlier Fick, Soziale Gliederung, ch.viii had documented the presence of brahmin farmers in the Jātakas. Though later than the Canon the evidence presented by Fick corresponds in some measure to the existence of similar data in the Dharmasūtras. See E. Ritschl, 'Brahmanische Bauern. Zur Theorie und Praxis der brahmanischen Ständeordnung im alten Indien', Altorientalische Forschungen, 7 (1980), pp. 177–87.

If this makes Milner's position somewhat problematic, other evidence in the Canon supports the general thrust of his view. Most of the brahmins who are given anything like a biographical treatment are portrayed as figures attracting social prestige not through their property holdings, but because they are skilled in Vedic knowledge. Perhaps even more important, they are capable of rehearsing constantly, and in a convincing manner, those arguments used everywhere to place the brahmin at the centre of society and culture. Nowhere do the brahmins make anything out of the materiality of their wealth, although they do receive criticism from the Buddhists on this account. What they are depicted parading is their learning. Of course, given the strength of renunciation and its associated values as a standard against which all other forms of behaviour could be tested, there is a degree of perceptible ambivalence about this. Brahmins were having it both ways in the image projected of them: as property owners and as learned religious specialists. As we will see, and has been noted many times, this was their Achilles heel exploited by the Buddha and others of his contemporaries.

The brahmin is the most prestigious non-Buddhist figure in the Pāli Canon and this elite status is both religious and economic. The term mahāsālā, used to designate a person possessing wealth in land, money, food and good appearance, is employed specifically to qualify the brahmin as well as the khattiya and the gahapati.¹³ There is evidence that brahmins were often enlisted as royal functionaries early on in the development of states; there were semi-autonomous brahmin settlements with wealth and power, and brahmins increasingly figured as officials engaged in administrative work. No doubt the canons of the high brāhmanical tradition stood for a more ancient set of ideals, according to which city life was polluting, and texts such as the Baudhāyana Dharmasūtra disapproved of brahmins being contaminated by urban occupations or serving the king;¹⁴ but the very fact that royal service was condemned is the best evidence that it was happening.

Brahmanical texts may have disparaged urban culture, but it was also a period when, as Buddhist sources richly attest, according to current perceptions many people identifying themselves as brahmins were supporting themselves not by religious practice but by employment in all manner of secular occupations. This practice never disqualified them from being brahmins, however, as long as, in subsequent centuries, they observed the correct procedures of ritual purity and impurity. The Sn portrays brahmins living by various crafts. The Jātakas (which of course may speak for perceptions belonging to a later time than is targeted here) frequently enough represent brahmins engaged in all sorts of employment, sometimes quite lowly. Sometimes they bring to their trade the sort of skill that men of sacred power might have been expected to possess; for example, brahmin snake charmers (abiguṇṭhika) tame snakes with herbs and incantations.¹⁵ This may also be seen in a more abstract sense in the power brahmins can develop when they accumulate large amounts of tapas. Examples are legion in the epics and Purāṇas and complete the multi-faceted image of the brahmin developing in Buddhist times as a figure who was a man of learning as well as a caster of spells and a reader of horoscopes, as the Brahmajālasutta tells us in such great detail.¹⁶ Some brahmins engage in trade and in many cases become rich, while others follow despised callings like hunting. Such secular brahmins, though they might (as nowadays) be technically qualified by their brahmin birth to officiate at rituals, had frequently lost touch with the sacred techniques and knowledge pertaining to their lineage; the Somadatta Jātaka refers to a brahmin farmer unable to remember or repeat a verse of scripture properly.¹⁷ But none of this vitiates the image they have continued to have to the present day of being learned, wedded to an ideal lifestyle of renunciation, and role models for all other jātis to follow.

¹³ Cf. Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins', pp. 60–1. See also SI 74, DI 136–7.

¹⁴ See Thapar, From Lineage to State, p. 88.

What we do not know about the brahmins is how much their economic status also flowed over into, or derived from, a more general cultural status such that they became role models for other groups within the society in areas of life other than the specifically religious. Such a question is difficult to answer because the brahmins appear to have operated in a range of networks, interdependencies and status positions. Was it this capacity to act opportunistically and in several different areas at once that caused the Buddha to have such an animus against certain brahmins? Increasingly there appears to have been a tension between the old idea of brahmins as specialists in sacred lore, associated pre-eminently with the ritual of sacrifice, and the newer reality of brahmins as primarily secular figures. As time wore on, they often had little but a retreating ancestry of sacred function to give them any claim to special status. In these circumstances the rise of the ascetics posed a serious challenge to the standing of brahmins in the community. The brahmin response was to incorporate asceticism within the brahmin ideology, ritualizing it in the process.

¹⁵ Fick, Soziale Gliederung, p. 237 cites JIV 457.

¹⁶ Fick, Soziale Gliederung, 159–61. ¹⁷ Ibid., 249ff.

It is likely the Buddha may have actually encountered the brahmins as an expanding group in the geographical areas with which he was most familiar. The innovation of granting whole villages to brahmins under the form of brahmadeyya may have been especially widespread in the Magadha and Kosala regions.¹⁸ As Thapar says, of the northeastern kingdoms: ‘The association of land with brahmins becomes more common at this time, and it is probable that in the process of establishing kingdoms those who performed the legitimizing rituals for the new kings may well have been given grants of land.’¹⁹ In the Nikāyas occur references to land grants made by kings to brahmins.²⁰ The term brahmadeyyo, used in Pāli to denote such grants, does not necessarily indicate an outright gift of land, but may mean (as the later epigraphic sources clearly enough show for land grants in general) that various rights including at least a part of royal revenue went to the beneficiaries with the land granted. The element brahma- does not have to mean that the gift is for brahmins, and it is not obvious that these grants carried full civil and judicial powers with them. It is not clear what was the nature of the relationship of brahmins to the land in the so-called brahmin villages; the expression could have meant that brahmins owned or controlled the land, or simply that they were numerous or powerful.²¹ This apparent economic wealth, substantially underplayed by their claims to function intrinsically as religious specialists, and their capacity to extend in an authoritative manner over an ever expanding geographical area, along with their proclivity to exhibit an ostentatious lifestyle, would have marked them out as targets either for attraction or repulsion. Hence the Buddha’s focus on brahmins to the apparent neglect of other classes in society.

There is a fundamental problem here, but it is one that requires us to read back to early Buddhism on the basis of data derived from later sources. This problem becomes apparent when we study the social stratification of donors as reflected in inscriptions between the second century BCE and the fourth century ACE. As Thapar tells us, continuing conclusions drawn from other scholars:

Examples of this category of patronage become evident during the period from the second century BC to the fourth century AD in the patronage extended to the building of stūpas such as those at Sanchi, Bharhut and Amaravati and the rock cut caves of the Western Deccan, all of which had at source donations to ¹⁸ Wagle, Society, pp. 18–19. ¹⁹ Thapar, From Lineage to State, p. 88.

²⁰ D I 87, where land is granted by King Pasenadi to a brahman, land which is ‘in the king’s gift (rājabhoggam). . . a gift of the king (rājadāyam), worthy to be given to a brahmin (brahmadeyyam). Cf. D I 111; 127 and 224, where similar terms are used of other prosperous estates enjoyed by brahmins.

²¹ Gokhale, ‘Early Buddhism’, p. 17.

the Buddhist saṅgha. The donations came substantially from artisans, guilds of craftsmen, traders, monks and nuns, small-scale landowners and to a lesser extent from royalty and families in high political and administrative office.²²

Apart from stūpa construction which was sponsored financially by kings and royalty, the financing of other smaller monumental structures was largely in the hands of all the non-elite classes. This seems universally to be so judging from the inscriptions. Yet these classes are not mentioned much, except in passing, in the Pāli texts. Of course, to be fully convincing the argument would have to draw on the basis of comparative counts of the occurrence of the respective groups in literature and inscriptions. Then and only then could a more sensible comparison be drawn.²³ It is likely to be the case that we are really dealing with two different historical periods, one where Buddhism – still in its incipient stage – has to impress its principal competitors in claims to a universal vision, the other – a later stage – when it was firmly anchored in Indian soil and had extended its base of material support across the entirety of society, measured in occupations and religious proclivities.

THE IMAGE OF THE BRAHMIN IN EARLY BUDDHIST LITERATURE

The renunciant ideal associated with saṃnyāsa began in the brahmin tradition perhaps about the fifth century BCE.²⁴ Buddhist canonical sources refer to ascetic brahmins who have fully embraced the principles of rigorous austerity; the Jāṭila ascetics wear animal skins and have matted hair. They do not beg for alms but live on gleanings; brahmin ascetics also maintain Vedic traditions, teach pupils, and perform sacrifices. As Tsuchida has argued, we should distinguish between true wandering ascetics and the brahmins who, by contrast, lived in āśramas, performed sacrifices, took fees and kept wives.²⁵ Some brahmin renunciators, perhaps, cut themselves off completely from society in the way that the thoroughgoing śramaṇa ideal demands; but to the extent that renunciation became institutionalized, it was doubtless quickly ritualized and modified. Olivelle says: 'The image of a renouncer totally divorced from and unconcerned about ordinary people and about his relatives is purely a theological (and perhaps scholarly) figment.'²⁶ In later centuries, life in a woodland hermitage became a subject for detailed prescription in the smṛtis and śāstras, with rules about diet, clothing and so forth, and the absence of outward ritual performance proper to brāhmaṇical rule was reinterpreted as an internalization of ritual within the self, with the body being seen as the sacrificial altar.²⁷ Yet the life of the renouncer is supposed to be the very antithesis of established ritual, a rejection of worldly concerns and of constraints imposed from outside the self. This process of domestication shows how different images of religious life, even when they can well be represented as mutually contradictory, may slide one into another; just as folk, public and ascetic Buddhisms were superimposed upon one another and often believed in by contemporaries as a single truth, so in brāhmaṇical tradition the ritual and renunciant traditions could be perceived as aspects of a single system.

²² R. Thapar, 'Patronage and Community', in B. Stoler Miller (ed.), The Powers of Art. Patronage in Indian Culture (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1992), p. 22. A fuller treatment is given in the same book by V. Dehejia, 'Collective and Popular Basis', pp. 35–45.

²³ Using data based on 2,426 men and women mentioned in both sets of texts, Sarao (Origin and Nature, p. 69) has shown that of the 1,371 people who can be identified by varṇa, 51.50% (706) are khattiyas, 29.18% (400) are brāhmanas, 11.30% (155) are low caste and 8.02% (110) are vessa. In addition, a much cited study by Gokhale ('The Early Buddhist Elite') replicates the general tenor of these figures, but only on the basis of a much more restricted source, the Thera- and Therīgāthās. Do these statistics help us read as social texts the manifestly ambivalent messages the rich narratives in M convey to us? There is no one-to-one correlation between frequency of meeting with members of a particular class and the attitude the Buddha manifests towards them. This would be simplistic in the extreme, even in literary constructions, and, furthermore, we should never assume that the caste grouping was monolithic in any sense other than the adoption of the caste reference as a source of identity itself.

²⁴ See Olivelle, Saṃnyāsa Upaniṣads, p. 52.

The Canon was ready to twin brahmins with śramaṇas as holy men deserving of respect. In portions of the Canon which may be the oldest, the verse gāthās, the term 'brahmin' occurs in application to the sage or the ascetic with perfected virtues, but the later prose portions rarely use the term without qualification in this way. This implies that in early times the brahmins still had prestige. The Su, for example, describes śramaṇas and brahmins alike as worthy mendicants (though of course not all brahmins were mendicants); the same text refers, however, to palatial complexes bestowed by kings upon brahmins in the time of brahmin decadence, indicating that Buddhists perceived a distinction between brahmin ideals and practice.

By the time of the Buddha, then, the status of the concept of a brahmin had evolved in complex ways. An old tradition, conventionally believed to be maintained in its greatest purity in the northern areas, associated the life of the brahmin with the cultivation of sacred wisdom, while in practice the families claiming brahmin status had increasingly become secularized, ²⁵ Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins', pp. 80ff.; 83ff.

²⁶ Olivelle, Samyāsa Upaniṣads, p. 73.

²⁷ See especially M. Biarreau and C. Malamoud, La Sacrifice dans L'Inde Ancienne (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1976), pp. 75ff.

partly as a result of success in attracting the patronage of the wealthy and powerful. The support given by such people inevitably had the same sort of effects in 'domesticating' the brahmins as it has in the history of Buddhism, and similar social mechanisms must be recognized.

Many scholars have alluded to the Buddha's development of a concept of the brahmin that would stand outside of received images of Buddhist monks and brahmins. Masefield has developed the point that there is a contrast between the behaviour of the brahmins of the Buddha's own day and this idealized construction mentioned in the previous paragraph. He evaluates the significance of this normative image – as a point of comparison – for the historical development of the early saṅgha:

From the foregoing it will be clear that by the period covered by the Nikāyas a group of individuals, from the Buddhist point of view of dubious ancestry, had arrogated to themselves a position of religious power and wealth on the basis that they alone embodied the sacred power of Brahman. The Buddhists, feeling that their unariyan behaviour disqualified them from this, openly criticized what they took to be a band of indigenuous opportunists, but in this they were motivated by no egalitarian ethic on behalf of the despised class. Indeed it was rather the other way round for the evidence of the Nikāyas suggests that it was the altogether more conservative cause of the kṣatriyas that the Buddhists favoured. The kṣatriyas were so intent on preserving the purity of Āryan blood that they took to incest whereas the brahmins would go with any varṇa or indeed a woman of the despised clans²⁸ (A 3.228), accepting, unlike the kṣatriyans, any offspring.²⁹

It is a possible view, even if an extreme one, that the normative image of the brahmin has nothing to it other than its rhetorical power. It is hardly an image of what brahmins could ever have been like in practice, though it might have been successful as a means of eliciting a deep set of values summarizing the ethos of the varṇa in its broadest, yet abstract, cultural sense at the time the Buddha lived. That is, it stood centrally enough within the brahmins' perception of themselves to be easily recognizable to them as a set of images bearing close relations with what some of their kind still were and hoped to be. In this sense it could be seen as one pure and very clearly defined image meaningful to all brahmins as a sign uniting the few disparate qualities associated with the class. It also served the important function of defining some kind of imputed essence against the two other principal classes and any other occupational groups that had previously gained visibility in the society.

²⁸ A III 228.

²⁹ P. Masefield, Divine Revelation in Pali Buddhism (Allen & Unwin, London, 1986), p. 160.

Its rhetorical power resides in its capacity to function as an unachievable standard against which any contemporaneous group can be measured, a standard held to be legitimate because of the strong grounding it has in a historically defined cultural tradition. It must have been valuable also because of the difficulty of finding anyone able to meet that requirement, a fact instrumental in strengthening its exclusivism given that some brahmins might have been recognized as having at least one foot in it. On the basis of texts cited by Masefield it is the arahant who is projected in the Buddhist texts as having the potential for fulfilling the requirements of the true brahmin. As an assessment of its cultural function within the Buddhist arsenal of rhetorical arms, we perhaps should take this as another instance of the well-cited Buddhist process of appropriating to itself certain rituals and ideals central to brāhmaṇical culture.

Indeed, the idea of brāhmaṇical corruption and impurity is emphasized. Most especially, brahmins are found wanting in the comparison with ksatriyas. For some, this comparison has seemed to fortify the supposition that, in the structure of very ancient Indian society, it was already possible to identify priests and lords as distinct classes in competition with each other. Since the two classes are defined by different sorts of criteria and have different functions, the notion of competition seems inappropriate. At all events, it is clear that Buddhist teachers made the comparison of the two classes directly, to the advantage of the lords.³⁰

Brahmins are criticized for their corrupt behaviour. 'These brahmin folk are greedy for money'; a set of noblemen is represented as assuming that a brahmin minister can be won over by money and women.³¹ Brahmins are so greedy for the rewards of assisting at a sacrifice that at the mere smell of it they run up to it like dung-eating animals.³² A similar attitude is conveyed in the Jātakas, where brahmins are portrayed as avaricious.³³ They are not only greedy; they are superstitious. Many brahmins, often unlettered and poor no doubt, made their living by divination and allied techniques, and in Buddhist sources they are ridiculed.

COMPETITION

The Buddhist teachers, then, were highly sensitive to the comparison between themselves and the brahmins. This comparison needs to be seen in ³⁰ See D I 92ff., 97ff., M II 84, 87ff. For the critique of contemporary brahmins for being materialistic and marrying anybody see A III 220.

³¹ D II 244ff. ³² M III 167.

³³ For this and the following see Fick, Soziale Gliederung, p. 229.

its ideological context. Individual brahmins are very often mentioned by name in the canon, but this does not necessarily mean that the Buddha very frequently met and converted people of brahmin stock. It means that those who later collected and codified the remembered stories of the teaching were particularly interested in setting out the points at which they saw their master as having offered values and teachings the brahmins lacked or did not clearly understand. Modern scholars have given a great deal of attention to the concrete detail of these references to brahmins,³⁴ often with valuable results, but we cannot of course expect to wring quantitative historical data about the biographies of individuals or the composition of the saṅgha from such sources. The way in which the Nikāyas duplicate incidents in different settings inevitably makes them seem to have happened more often than it is likely they actually did. Tsuchida, emphasizing the dangers of treating the suttas as historical records, gives the example of the brahmin Jānuṣsoṇi, who was mentioned in six different sutta contexts as having been converted.³⁵ We cannot assume that the number of references to conversion of brahmins has a close relationship with the actual number of conversions of brahmins.

Clearly, there was a great deal more to the Buddhist attitude towards the brāhmaṇical orthodoxy than that it could constitute a field for conversions. A heterodox or minority tradition needs to relate itself to the orthodox or mainstream practice;³⁶ almost necessarily, Buddhism mapped itself upon a structure supplied by the brahmins, defining itself by reference to what it was not; a series of systematic oppositions identified its relationship to the pre-existing orthodoxy. Even though the canon does not contain detailed analysis of brāhmaṇical texts, the dhamma displays in all sorts of ways a disposition to contrast itself systematically with what they preached.

Several writers have commented on the systematic superimposition of Buddhist concepts upon the brāhmaṇical ones which they invert or supersede.³⁷ Gombrich, for example, has argued that the teachings of the ³⁴ See especially Chakravarti, Social Dimensions, pp. 125–8; appendix C, pp. 198–206.

³⁵ Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins', p. 77. For Tsuchida, it appears likely that comparatively few brahmins actually entered the order as a result of conversion by the Buddha; those who did would have been from the special class of brahmin ascetics rather than from among the many ordinary brahmins following secular careers; see p. 66 and n. 47. But these ascetic brahmins could have constituted a large proportion of the saṅgha.

³⁶ A graphic example of this is the way in which, in Tibet, the Bon religious practice involves the performance of circumambulation of a shrine anti-clockwise, to contrast itself to the Buddhist pradakṣiṇā.

³⁷ See I. W. Mabbett, 'Buddhism and freedom', in D. Kelly and A. J. S. Reid (eds.), Asian Freedoms (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1998), pp. 19–36.

canon are much more closely modelled on the Vedas than is generally realized.³⁸ For example, against the brāhmaṇical myth of the origin of the four ritual orders of society, the varṇas, Buddhism proclaims a different version in which the brahmins lose their divinely ordained privilege; and Tambiah comments that 'the real thrust of the Buddhist story is that it is self-consciously an inversion of the Vedic theory of the origin of the varṇa'.³⁹ Tsuchida refers to the Buddhist habit of redefining brāhmaṇical terms in a new sense, subordinating the original sense to the Buddhist conceptions without actually rejecting the brāhmaṇical meaning, as in cases such as vijjācarāṇa, yañña, and of course brāhmaṇa.⁴⁰

Again, Gombrich points to the way in which the Buddhist doctrine of karma consistently inverts the brāhmaṇical notion of action, turning it, paradoxically, into the morality of the actor's state of mind, which is not a physical 'action' at all; similarly the Buddhist emphasis upon psychological action entails a recognition that mechanical acts of austerity are without value compared to true insight leading to enlightenment, and Rhys Davids compares this valuation with the new emphasis in the Upaniṣads upon gnosis as against sacrifice or asceticism.⁴¹ Of course, it is true that the Pāli Canon does not discuss the philosophy of the Upaniṣads as such, and it is not obvious that Buddhist texts can be said to reflect any knowledge of the content of the brāhmaṇical texts. It has been argued though that the Alagaddupama Sutta demonstrates the Buddha's familiarity with the Bṛhadāranyaka Upaniṣad, because the former systematically attacks or redefines the latter's theses point by point.⁴²

The Buddhist treatment of the threefold sacred fire of brāhmaṇical ritual is another instance; Buddhism identified fire with the saṃsāric entanglements of life in the society that the bhikkhu left behind, representing these as the three fires of rāga, dveṣa and moha. Likewise the three Vedas of the priests are paralleled by the three higher knowledges of Buddhism, tevijja, and the brāhmaṇical sacrifices are matched by the bhikkhu's metaphorical ones. Boris Oguibene has detected a parallel threefold structure in the ³⁸ R. F. Gombrich, 'How the Mahāyāna began', Journal of Pali and Buddhist Studies, 1 (1988), pp. 29–46; reprinted in T. Skorupski (ed.), The Buddhist Forum: Seminar Papers 1987–88, Volume 1 (School of Oriental and African Studies, London, 1990), pp. 5–20. This article suggests that probably the Pāli sutta represents sūta 'well spoken', and that suttānta deliberately parallels vedānta.

³⁹ S. J. Tambiah, World Conqueror and World Renouncer: a study of Buddhism and polity in Thailand against a historical background (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1976), p. 22.

⁴⁰ Tsuchida, 'Two categories of brahmins', p. 75.

⁴¹ T. W. Rhys Davids (trans.), Dialogues of the Buddha (PTS, London, reprint 1973), vol. 1, p. 211.

⁴² K. R. Norman, 'A note on Attā in the Alagaddupama Sutta', in Studies in Indian Philosophy. A Memorial Volume in Honour of Pt Sukhlalji Sanghvi (Ahmedabad, 1981), pp. 19–29.

brāhmaṇical sacrifice and in the Buddhist transfer of merit, wherever this latter notion may be said to apply.⁴³

This almost obsessive mapping of Buddhist teachings upon the structure of brāhmaṇical tradition clearly demonstrates that the Buddhists saw themselves as competitors with the brahmins, in spite of the obvious differences in their concerns. When all was said and done, the Buddha identified himself as a protagonist of brāhmaṇical ideals, revived and purified. His teaching could be seen as wholly consistent with brāhmaṇical ideals understood in a special sense – the sense which in fact corresponded, not to the values and institutions of brahmins in ordinary social life, with their rituals and their memorized texts, or even to the priesthood of the ancient Vedic pastoral society, but to the ascetic brahmin programme, a programme which itself originated within the priestly fold probably in large part as a response to the influence of the heterodox śramaṇas and could be accommodated within brāhmaṇical orthodoxy only at the cost of much tension and ideological indigestion. This ascetic brahmin was conceived of as the truly self-sufficient being independent of others, as the arch-renouncer, ‘with no provisions even for the next day’, and his ascetic way of life was the highest sacrifice. But it is the worldly lifestyle of the allegedly corrupt eastern brahmins that is most obtrusive in the Buddhist literature, and the dhamma is set up as an alternative to their ritualism, to their monopolism, and their ignorance. Yet, however much difference there may have been between the brāhmaṇical ideals and brāhmaṇical behaviour as thus described, the disciples of the Buddha recognized some form of threat or rivalry in the activities of their priestly opponents. This must reflect competition in their actual social relationship, however incommensurable their programmes may appear. The nature of this competition must hold the key to an understanding of the needs to which the Buddhists were able to respond in an urban society with the accompanying process of urbanization.

To appreciate fully the rich image of the brahmin and the attitude of ambivalence – emphasizing the rejection and attraction the Buddha felt towards the brahmins and their social success – it is necessary to refer directly to a series of passages from the Majjhima Nikāya. These are of more significance for our purpose than passages in other texts, except perhaps for the Vinaya, in so far as they portray in a very full sense the social interaction between the Buddha and individual brahmins. That it is individual brahmins whom the Buddha is depicted as confronting, not groups of them, may make for better dramatics. This supposition holds validity even in the light of the view sometimes expressed in the texts that if one leader of a group defeated another one in debate, the followers of the defeated became followers of the victor. The first text to be cited is significant primarily in showing the kind of protocol the brahmins use in addressing the Buddha. It recurs elsewhere, hence is clearly a stock passage conveying one sense of the ritualized relations between a designated class of religious figures and a particular holy man. In the Apaṇṇakasutta the Buddha is described going to a brahmin village of the Kosalans named Sālā. The brahmin householders hear of his reputation, one communicated to them in highly devotional terms. Here is a description of the ritualized initial meeting between the brahmins and the Buddha:

⁴³ B. Oguibenine, ‘From a Vedic ritual to the Buddhist practice of initiation into the doctrine’, in P. Denwood and A. Piatigorsky (eds), Buddhist Studies Ancient and Modern (Curzon Press, London, 1983), pp. 118–20.

Then the brahmin householders of Sālā went up to the Lord. Some who had gone up greeted the Lord and sat down at a respectful distance. Some exchanged greetings with the Lord, conversed pleasantly and politely, and sat down at a respectful distance. Some saluted the Lord with joined palms and sat down at a respectful distance. Some declared their names and clans in the Lord's presence and sat down at a respectful distance. Some became silent and sat down at a respectful distance. The Lord said this to the brahmin householders of Sālā when they were sitting down at a respectful distance.⁴⁴

After this greeting the Buddha proceeds to give a teaching on dhamma in the traditional manner, though not a progressive talk.

There are various markers of relations designated here between the Buddha and the brahmin gahapatis, wealthy householders. Spatial difference is immediately established between all the brahmins and the Buddha. They sit down at a respectful distance, not to one side as the monks do when in close proximity with the Buddha at a time when he is giving a teaching, but in a way still giving emphasis to distance, though there are variations on this in other passages. Not all brahmins do sit down at a respectful distance, as we will see soon, but spatial isolation amidst a group of people is a standard device for reinforcing the Buddha's charisma and maintaining a distinction that was as much for dramatic purposes as for reasons of emphasis of religious difference. Four different modes of greeting are enumerated here:

- (1) 'Some who had gone up greeted the Lord'
- (2) 'Some exchanged greetings with the Lord, conversed pleasantly and politely'
- (3) 'Some saluted the Lord with joined palms'
- (4) 'Some declared their names and clans in the Lord's presence . . . became silent'

⁴⁴ MI 401, 290-1; MII 55.

Each of these implies a different level of confidence in greeting a figure whose reputation precedes him, who has the general bearing of a holy figure – although the impression given in the texts is that he is a towering figure, even if this impression is implied rather than made explicit – with all the behavioural implications that brings with it, but who, nevertheless, is a highly social being. Other modes of address have been studied in detail by Wagle, but we need to be aware how important it was for the marketing of the Buddha's message that he be portrayed always at the centre of the appropriate spatial or social location.

A more expansive exploration of the relation between a prominent brahmin and the Buddha is conveyed in the Selasutta.⁴⁵ The narrative brings out all the themes we find elsewhere in the Majjhima Nikāya:

The Buddha arrived at the town of Āpaṇa. Keṇiya the matted hair ascetic heard about this and, knowing of the Buddha's reputation, he heard the words, 'The sight of arahants of such an appearance is certainly very good' (kho pana tathārūpānaṃ arahataṃ dassanaṃ hoti ti).

Keṇiya went up to the Buddha and invited him to a meal on the following day. The Buddha said to him, 'But, Keṇiya, the Order of monks is huge, twelve hundred and fifty monks, and you are strongly disposed (abhippasanno) towards the brahmins.' Initially he declined, but after Keṇiya's perseverance, the Buddha finally agreed to come for a meal.

Keṇiya organised all his relations to help him with the job and they constructed a pavilion for him.

Then a celebrated brahmin named Sela arrived, saw the preparations and asked, 'Is the honourable Keṇiya now holding the ritual journey to the bride's house or the ritual departure from the bride's house? Or has a huge sacrifice been organised or has King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha been invited tomorrow together with his troops?'

Then he told Sela the Buddha was coming. Sela began theorising about the Buddha's titles and asked to meet him. He sat down in front of him with his three hundred disciples and speculated in his mind about the Buddha's thirty-two special bodily marks. Knowing his thoughts, the Buddha revealed the two hidden marks as a means of demonstrating empirically his possession of them.

[Then occurs a series of verses summarising in a formulaic manner the career path of a Buddha. After this the Buddha declared himself as a self-awakened one in the context of the Cakkavattin theory and his role as a turner of the wheel of dhamma.

Sela and his followers then all declared they would go forth and become renouncers.

⁴⁵ M II 146ff. Not printed in the PTS edn, but included in the digital version of the International Buddhist Research and Information Center. Other versions are found in the Su, p. 103 and Vin I 245ff. D I 87–110 is similar in intent.

The Buddha arrived for the meal and Keṇiya himself served the Buddha as a sign of respect. The Buddha then recited certain verses expressive of dhamma and Sela became perfected.]

The celebration of brahmins here and elsewhere in the canon serves just to strengthen the rhetorical power of the conversion frame enclosing the narrative. The power of the Buddha is defined both by the transformative capacity of his teaching and by his physical uniqueness expressed through the possession of his thirty-two marks.⁴⁶ This becomes an important component of his charisma, a judgement confirmed in the text itself when Keṇiya expresses the opinion about the positive value to be had simply from seeing the Buddha, an attitude found not infrequently in the meal narratives. The problem of charisma arises because of the centrality of the act of darśana in Indian culture. Is the charisma independent of the set of qualities defining this subject as an object of vision, or is every figure who is the object of vision in possession of charisma?

This kind of treatment of the Buddha is crucial in telling us about the pressures working on the composers of the text to depict him in this heightened manner and, conversely, about the brahmins in defining themselves as that social group having the highest level of sanctity in a society where sanctity was assuming increasing importance as one of the central elements in defining social rank. But why would people entitled to confidence in their own social and cultural position, as Sela is, so easily abandon that aspect of their life – varṇa affiliation – which defines them so clearly at the pinnacle of society?⁴⁷ It is obvious why the Buddha should be depicted in this position. In a highly competitive situation, the highest stakes will be brought into play and the underdog destined to be revealed as superior and filled with a quiet confidence in his own capacity to transform individuals and society. But this does not explain why the brahmins would be converted with what appears to be such relative ease – unless, that is, the historical situation in which the narratives were composed was not just one of considerable social and economic fluidity, but also one where there was a serious decline in confidence about personal and social identity.

⁴⁶ A further contributing factor, building up the reputation of the Buddha as a man of power, would be the kind of miracles performed by the Buddha and other monks. See Phyllis Granoff, 'The ambiguity of miracles. Buddhist understandings of supernatural power', East and West, 46 (1996), pp. 79–96.

⁴⁷ A passage at D III 81 is instructive here. In it are criticized brahmins who have become monks. They are charged with abandoning a superior varṇa for an inferior one, namely that 'of shaveling recluses, who are menials, offspring of their kinsman's feet'.

A related narrative is the Brahmāyusutta.⁴⁸ Again the problem turns on the question of the existence of the thirty-two marks.

[Brahmāyu, a prominent brahmin, sent his young brahmin student Uttara to discover whether the Buddha really had the thirty-two marks. He discovered that he did but only after the Buddha, using his psychic power, consciously revealed the 'penis sheath' and 'the tongue'.

When Brahmāyu heard that the Buddha was nearby, he announced his wish to see him in Makhadeva's Mango Grove. But he had a misgiving,] 'It definitely doesn't seem right to me that I should go up to see the recluse Gotama without being announced first.'⁴⁹ So he sent a brahmin youth to inform the Buddha that he would be coming. The youth was instructed to inform Buddha that Brahmāyu was a brahmin of extremely high standard, educated in all branches of knowledge. He says, 'Of all the brahmins and householders who live in Mithilā, sir, Brahmāyu the brahmin is declared to be the foremost in wealth, Brahmāyu the brahmin is declared to be the foremost in mantras (142); Brahmāyu the brahmin is declared to be foremost in longevity as well as in renown. He wants to see the good Gotama.' (141–2)

[The Buddha agreed and,]

'Then Brahmāyu the brahmin went up to the Lord. His assembly saw the brahmin Brahmāyu coming in the distance. When they saw him near each made room for him because he was well known and renowned. Then Brahmāyu the brahmin said to the assembly: "No sirs, each of you sit on your own seat. I will sit here near the recluse Gotta." ' (142)

[Then he sat down at a respectful distance from the Buddha and asked to see all the thirty-two marks. Using his psychic power the Buddha showed him these, after which Brahmāyu asked how one becomes a brahmin, how one is perfected. In response the Buddha offered a speech about how one could attain enlightenment.] Impressed by this, when this had been said, 'Brahmāyu the brahmin got up from his own seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, placed his head at the Lord's feet, kissed them all around with his mouth and stroked them on all sides with his hands, and declared his name "I, good Gotama, am Brahmāyu, the brahmin." Then the assembly was filled with wonder and astonishment, and said: "It is quite amazing, it is quite astonishing that the psychic power and the majesty of the recluse are so great that Brahmāyu the brahmin, well known and renowned, pays such deep respect." '

[Then the Buddha told Brahmāyu to sit down on his own seat and then spoke to him about a range of topics, after which Brahmāyu asked to be accepted as a lay-disciple.

⁴⁸ M II 134–46. Because of its length we have summarized it here.

⁴⁹ M I 141. Na kho m'etaṃ patirūpaṃ yo'haṃ pubbe appaṭisaṃvidito samaṇaṃ gotamaṃ dassanāya upasaṅkameyyan ti. The translation does not exactly capture the strength of the self-expression of Brahmāyu's self-worth created linguistically by the occurrence of the first person pronoun me with the repetitions of the third and first person pronouns yo'ham.

As if in recognition of this acceptance, he invited the Buddha and the Order to a meal on the following day and fed them himself by his own hand.]

This narrative points to some of the likely tensions framing the encounter between the Buddha and early monks and the brahmins. It takes no acumen to see that the Buddha himself rests on some kind of austere pedestal, that he does not at any time reveal a need to see the brahmin. At all times he is doing the brahmin a manifest favour in providing him with an audience. Never is he impressed by the qualities the brahmin is reputed to possess, qualities making him renowned and widely known, implying that his own status is such that he need not concern himself with the attracting power of such qualities at all.

It is this fame the Buddha is most concerned about. Of course, this is never stated so baldly in the texts themselves since it is in such broad contradiction to the Buddhist axiom that a Buddha and his followers must be those who have made an incontrovertible decision to abandon any desire, even desire for social status. Yet, for all that, it is the unstated sub-text beneath so many of the narratives detailing the encounter between the Buddha and brahmins. The presentation of the brahmin in this formulaic manner builds up the climax of the encounter where the conversion is not necessarily the most important element. It is the act of undermining the social and cultural qualities of the brahmin – qualities implicitly repudiated when Brahmāyu becomes a lay Buddhist – that assumes primacy in the narrative. For it is these social and cultural qualities the Buddha seeks to undermine. Not that he did not take culture or society seriously. In order to renounce them he had to understand them. Rather, at the heart of his message and his own example is the conviction that a person must develop himself and constantly test his progress within the strictures of a clear-cut moral path and doctrinal framework laid down by the Buddha himself. This framework is valid irrespective of the social and cultural forces operating on it.

All that the texts offer about the Buddha is his status as a perfected being and the possessor of those particular qualities enabling him to offer darśana and to be approached as one who is worthy of being gazed upon. But in the ancient (and contemporary) cultural context this is of enormous importance. In a sense the texts are presenting us with a confrontation between two different sets of values. As has been commented upon frequently, the brahmins were reinforcing their identity in society by successfully keeping their feet in both the secular and religious camps, where the latter had been reinterpreted to encompass alike the all-inclusive ritualist tradition and the renunciatory lifestyle which in various of its forms offers a substantial rejection of the ritual cosmology. The Buddha by his own example offers a radical renunciation as the standard for all behaviour, and this is used by the Buddhist apologists both to undermine the brāhmaṇical position and also to present a unique path that offers the possibility of standing out firmly and distinctively against this very position.

THE BUDDHA'S CHARISMA AND SOCIAL MARKETING

Though there may be a competitive tinge in the great majority of encounters the Buddha has with brahmins, the Buddha is always depicted as standing aside in some way from the brahmins – or anyone else for that matter whom he encounters. This has the effect of distinguishing him from them as a special, if not unique, figure whose distinctive nature was inseparable from his teaching and experience. The kind of aloofness, social distancing and lack of emotion present in so many of these portrayals is both a representation of an enlightened being and a marketing device to underline the Buddha's own superiority in respect of those against whom he is implicitly in confrontation. Therefore if we are analysing the portrayal of the brahmins in Buddhist literature primarily from the perspective of their capacity to promote themselves as a distinguished high-status group, it is important to see what strategies the texts use to mark up the Buddha as a unique and high-status figure. The texts take pains to present the Buddha as a charismatic figure. Reginald Ray has made an excellent analysis of the bases of this charisma and there is no need to repeat his conclusions here.⁵⁰ In a previous chapter we analysed a passage, one of many, where the Buddha offers very broad guidance to the laity directed towards the achievement of success in a whole range of areas – mostly non-religious.⁵¹ On such occasions, which presumably must have occurred with great frequency during his preaching career, the Buddha taught a wide range of people of differing intellects and interests, many of whom would have hardly had a particular interest in the kind of religious message he usually sought to offer. Many other examples of a more specific kind are concentrated in the second book of the Majjhima Nikāya. In these texts the kind of activity in which the Buddha is portrayed derives its legitimacy from the content of the message, but also assumes the drawing power of his status as a figure whose appeal derives from his fame and his charisma. Both of these – content of ⁵⁰ R. Ray, Buddhist Saints in India (Oxford University Press, New York, 1994), pp. 44–61.

⁵¹ See ch. 2, and cf. Vin I 226ff.

message and charisma of the messenger – must be interrelated because even if the Buddha was highly charismatic (according to the standards of ancient India), this charisma would not have sanctioned him to say anything at all. There had to be recognition of the cultural needs of a variety of devotees as well as of his own capacity to deliver a talk on any range of subjects relevant to the time and milieu.

The mythology and darśanic material so common in the Pāli texts do not necessarily magnify the Buddha's charisma. Both, however, add to its mystique and ground the Buddha in several deep religious streams – especially a devotional one – that must have existed in India prior to his time. Both provide a background serving to consolidate an image that might have otherwise easily come to lose its potency. The extraordinary nature of the figure flows into the message he offers and gives it a measure of authority. To this charisma needs to be contrasted the practicality of the message he delivers. It is all of this that those who would deal with him must confront, and the texts never tire of offering us this uniquely constructed figure around whom everyone else must make their own way.

But the Buddha's charisma and whatever is associated with it make sense only in comparison with the other kinds of charismatic figures inhabiting Buddhist texts. And there are masses of them, judging from the numbers of followers they have, though such charisma is not often attributed to the brahmins, a characteristic which must arouse our interest. Their authority lies in their role as spokesmen of a tradition they are required neither to defend nor to substantiate. They can speak for this tradition because it has been successfully established as the standard against which most other cultural forms will be measured, and the dominant groups in the society accept this as such. Against this the Buddha, presenting a new message (even if it is claimed to be old), has constantly to present his message in the face of an ideology already fundamentally grounded in both theory and practice. If his charismatic reception preceded him, this would undoubtedly have helped him confront a tradition that had always proved impossible to overturn. All he could do was allow himself to be accommodated at its side.

In the second book of the Majjhima Nikāya, as well as in parts of the Dīgha and the Samyutta Nikāyas, the portrayal of the Buddha continually alternates between a figure possessed of supernatural powers (though these are never used extravagantly and only as a means of self-revelation to others) and a 'rational' human being who has worked towards and attained a state of enlightenment using only human capacities. Both positions avail themselves of particular modes of representation and, presumably, were meant to be conveyed to different constituencies. We cannot say simply that the figure of the Buddha with the thirty-two marks, who at various times deals in a superior manner with the gods at an everyday level and who has attracted a profuse mythology, was simply created for the benefit of lay Buddhists and potential converts. Surely the figure must have appealed to individuals coming from right across the spectrum of levels of articulation, intellectual development and capacity.

To whom was the image of the rationalistic 'self-help' Buddha attractive? To some putative arabant or late commentator, or is it substantially a twentieth-century construction? Certainly, the many passages in the M, where the Buddha takes such pains to deliver stern, if highly systematic, discourses on the jhānas and the formless states, on the hindrances, the five graspings etc., strongly convey a highly didactic Buddhism propagated by a pedagogical Buddha. These are teachings extending far beyond the understanding or interest of all but the most highly sophisticated devotee. And, as if to highlight the high stakes in play, these teachings are framed by narratives of conversion, thus communicating the drama of an intellectual victory.⁵² If both images were viable (and given the frequency of their occurrence, we must assume they were) as communicative devices, what did they sustain beyond the specific messages they were intending to communicate and to what extent were they intended for groups of differing socio-economic origins? We cannot underrate the importance of the social origin, economic status and the varṇa affiliation of these groups, for if they were analysed in tabular form they would depict a highly complex society of potentially conflicting status. Even if the groups are usually only described in broad stereotypical terms, the texts provide enough evidence for us to be confident that the Buddhist message was being addressed to the whole of society in the broadest possible measure. However, even when we know this, the textual evidence, with a few exceptions, does not enable us to focus on what the Buddha conveyed specifically to those groups who were of a lower class⁵³ than the various elite groups we have outlined in an earlier chapter.

⁵² It is noteworthy that in such instances the Buddha never speaks highly of his own teaching. He only presents it in a highly modulated manner and the praise is placed in the mouth of the recipient of the message. The kind of stock response usually offered is given at S I 161, for example.

⁵³ Unless we take the Buddha's encounter with yakkhas and other 'folk deities' as falling within the ambit of non-brāhmaṇical religion and therefore of not requiring such a sophisticated response as necessitated for the former. See Greg Bailey, 'Problems of the interpretation of the data pertaining to religious interaction in ancient India: the conversion stories in the Sutta Nipāta', Indo-British Review, 19 (1991), pp. 16–17.

If the ritual meal is one means whereby the interaction between the Buddha and potential (initially antagonistic) converts is mediated in a non-competitive manner, and reciprocity applies as the means of exchange, other narratives provide us with instances where the competition is much more pronounced. In raising the theme of competition they also reflect intensely, if unintentionally, on the Buddha's charisma. Two instances will suffice. The first comes from the Caṅkīsutta.⁵⁴

The Buddha is wandering in a particular region inhabited by Caṅkī, an eminent brahmin, who indicates to his fellow brahmins that he wants to go and see the Buddha (Sādhu kho pana tathārūpānaṃ arahataṃ dassanaṃ hotī'ti). Other brahmins tell him that the Buddha should come and see Caṅkī, as he is a brahmin of high renown in his own right.

He is:

- (1) of pure birth on both sides back through seven generations;
- (2) prosperous, very wealthy and rich (aho mahaddhano mahābhogo);
- (3) learned in all the accepted areas of scholarship including knowledge of the marks of a great man;
- (4) very handsome, of sublime complexion and unblemished appearance;
- (5) very moral;
- (6) possessed of excellent communicative skills and an auspicious voice;
- (7) an accomplished teacher;
- (8) revered by King Pasenadi of Kosala;
- (9) revered by the brahmin Pokkharasti;
- (10) dwelling as overlord in Opasāda, given to him as a gift by King Pasenadi.

In response to this Caṅkī provides a set of reasons as to why the Buddha should be visited. Of these the following are listed:

- (1) The Buddha is of pure birth on both sides back through seven generations.
- (2) The Buddha renounced, giving away much gold.
- (3) The Buddha renounced when he was still young.
- (4) The Buddha renounced even though his parents were very upset.
- (5) The Buddha is very handsome, of sublime complexion and unblemished appearance.
- (6) He is very moral.
- (7) He has excellent communicative skills and an auspicious voice.
- (8) He is the teacher of many teachers.
- (9) He has destroyed attachment to sense pleasures.
- (10) He teaches about kamma and has no evil intentions (appapurekkhro) towards brahmins.
- (11) He has renounced from a distinguished family of khattiyas.
- (12) He has renounced from a family both prosperous and very rich (aḍḍhakulā . . . mahaddhanā mahābhogā).
- (13) People come from distant countries to question him.

⁵⁴ S II 164–77.

- (14) Thousands of deities have gone to him for refuge on account of (or 'with') living beings.
- (15) He is a fully perfected one, a Buddha etc.
- (16) He has the thirty-two marks of a great man.
- (17) King Bimbisāra goes to him for the same reason.
- (18) The brahmin Pokkharasati goes to him for the same reason.
- (19) He is a guest and guests must be honoured by brahmins.

In addition, all sorts of prominent figures, including kings and brahmins (whom he names), have previously gone to see him.

The two lists of qualities overlap considerably. They are important for providing clues as to why cultural elites in the Buddha's time accorded him a status that would attract to him those members of society who were so confident in the worth of their own traditional status and the acceptance of this status by the majority of the members in that society, especially by those who were of lower status. Moreover, this importance is enhanced by the clear competitive context in which this list is constructed. Perhaps competition is a misleading word to use. Rather, the monks supportive of Caṅkī are strongly concerned about status disjunction, and presumably in offering a list of qualities possessed by Caṅkī, they are making two implications: that these are the qualities of traditional brahmins, and that non-brahmins, even those who are renowned religious teachers, do not possess them. That Caṅkī comes so quickly and firmly to the Buddha's defence may be a device of the Buddhist editors of the text to put down the other brahmins by repudiating them with one of their own.

In the distinction between the qualities attributed to the Buddha and those attributed to Caṅkī, three categories can be isolated:

(a) Those common to the Buddha and to Caṅkī. These are attributed to the Buddha in order to place him on a par with a renowned brahmin of the householder type, who is learned in all the traditional skills as well as the traditional marks of the great man, an attribute which once more narratively subordinates the brahmin to the Buddha in this particular context.

(b) Those the brahmin alone possesses. These relate specifically to the brahmin's possession of wealth, an essential attribute if he is to fit the depiction of the householder brahmin in the Canon, and his knowledge of the sources of traditional brāhmaṇical learning. These the Buddha would not normally have, both because he is a critic of them and because what they teach is scarcely consistent with the eight-limbed path encapsulating his own teaching.

(c) Those exclusive to the Buddha himself. The first relates to the brahmin's possession of wealth. The Buddha does not now have wealth, but he has had it in the past and gave it all up. Thus, he was a successful householder, as symbolized by his possession of this wealth, but by rejecting it has simultaneously fulfilled his credentials as a renouncer.

There are nine common features to both lists. Several elements (1, 4, 6) derive directly from the Buddha's charisma, another (1) from his pure birth, a feature the brahmins continually claim in support of their own status, two others (2 and 3) because he fits a particular mould, that of the religious specialist, and finally, because of his renown (7).

The charismatic qualities conferring a special status upon the Buddha, certain brahmins and other holy men can never be underrated in their utility as marketing the attraction of these figures to the majority of the population believing themselves not to possess such star quality. Inevitably a strong competitive element must emerge as well as a need to develop criteria to distinguish these stars from each other. But it would not be enough just to read into these apparent competitive encounters a further indication that Buddhism developed in an environment of elites. If we reverse the line of approach two other questions become evident. First, why would the mercantile groups plus other financial and cultural elites have been so eager to make themselves seen to be so closely associated with the Buddha, both physically and financially? Secondly, what interest would it serve for narratives of this kind to be included in the Canon?

In response to the first question, let us initially note that these elites were of two kinds, roughly divisible into brahmins and others. The two groups are treated differently in the narratives dealing with the ritualized meal and in other contexts where someone is depicted deriving favour from the Buddha or becoming a candidate for conversion. The brahmins do not appear to engage in competition with each other, though their activity is always undertaken against a backdrop of a very broad competitive attitude operating between the Buddha and brahmins, both offering different religious positions. Often the conflict with the Buddha becomes almost heated as in the verbal conflicts occurring in the 'brahmin suttas' of the third book of the Dīgha Nikāya. The brahmins defend their traditional position and the Buddha rebuts it, though never is he depicted in any stance other than one of repose. Continually the brahmins are depicted as reactionaries, the Buddha as progressive and logical. But knowing this does not answer the question as to the apparent attraction of some brahmins to the Buddha's message and to the figure of the Buddha himself. Was it that the traditional hegemony of the brahmins' message was breaking down, that as a result of a changing society the brahmins were really questioning their past intellectual heritage? Evidence derived from the immense speculation about ancient Indian society in the Mahābhārata might be taken as a support of this argument, for there a society is depicted that is quite unsure of its cultural foundations. Alternatively, this text could equally be taken as reaffirming brāhmaṇical hegemony by showing that the brahmins really were capable of questioning their own intellectual presuppositions and of adjusting them to altered socio-economic and political conditions.

Without any evidence to the contrary, it seems better to postulate a range of factors explaining this attraction towards the Buddha. In the first instance, brahmins were definitely being required to recognize that their environment had changed, though this did not mean it had become more negative in an economic sense. Their own power had not been threatened because it was not primarily dependent upon ownership of material assets. Yet they must have been coming into contact with different ethnic groups, inhabiting land they had to colonize, and they had to defend their own world view against others of equal sophistication and breadth to their own. Given the charisma of the Buddha and his capacity to win arguments, it is not surprising that he should win some of the brahmins over to his side. This being the case, the texts dealing with the conversion of brahmins do not really tell us if the conversion of individual brahmins was a consequence of individual crises, alienation from the system or genuine attraction to the Buddha's message.

A second factor must have been the figure of the Buddha himself. Here was a person who had appeared to master the vagaries of time, one to whom even death itself held no fear. Fear of death and the development of a ritual means to overcome death are paramount in pre-Buddhist brāhmaṇical thought. Thirdly, but related to the second, the Upaniṣads themselves do offer an alternative to death in their emphasis on liberating knowledge and a break from the circularity of karma. Yet the associated lifestyle practice, with the exception of meditation and tapas, is absent from there, whereas in the appropriate teachings of the Buddha, subsequently codified in the Vinaya, this kind of practice is given in great detail and with very little room left for doubt.

As to why the composers of the Buddhist texts would have been so keen to include so many narratives dealing with the brahmins, one can only suggest the following reasons. It is quite possible they may have been presenting a particular historical situation, albeit interpreted through their own beliefs and reframed accordingly, where the brahmins were the principal cultural elites in a society where production and warfare were valued less highly than the ability to disseminate religious and cultural knowledge. Any victory over the brahmins would have been a victory for the supporters of the Buddha, though it could not have been shown to be such for the Buddha, whose textual persona was such that he was beyond this kind of ambition. To develop this argument fully we need to know much more about the actual networks of influences brahmins had in the villages and towns where the Buddha spent much of his time, but the texts simply do not allow us access to this knowledge. Secondly, it enabled the Buddhists to be appearing to stand with the elites of society. Despite their professed disinterest in varṇa as a source of prestige, the capacity to be accepted substantially by that group, known from time immemorial to set the cultural agenda for the entire society, must have been a major bonus for the fledgling Buddhist community. This does not fit awkwardly with their desire to stand alone. For them, the cultural Other were certainly the brahmins, but they envied them at the same time as viewing them as antagonists, in one area of life at least. This is not to suggest that the Buddhists wished to usurp the position of the brahmins, just that they would have liked to have the same status as an alternative in a society awash with sects offering their own pathway to liberation.

CONCLUSION

Of all the groups who populate the social and cultural world depicted in the Pāli Canon it is with the brahmins and members of his own order that the Buddha has most interaction. That it is this group reinforces the point that Buddhism began as an elite movement before expanding to encompass most levels of society in its embrace. Nor is it simply a question of economic elites, though this factor cannot be left out of any discussion of the problem, as there is much substantive textual and (later) inscriptional evidence that brahmins were materially wealthy. Rather, we must recognize in this interaction a concern to place the Buddha on an equal or superior footing to any group placed at the pinnacle of society in the specific sense that it was both the origin and custodian of the dominant (if not hegemonic) values in that society. In this its role had been fêted for centuries, although we are still at a loss to know exactly how this was manifested in practice. Nor do the Pāli texts elaborate on the details of the management of this custodianship. What is significant is that they assume it. And in spite of the Buddha's equanimity and aloofness in the face of the brahmins there can be no doubt his reaction to them was not just a simple one of tolerance and acceptance. His creation of an image of an ideal brahmin was an attempt to undermine the perceived superiority of the brahmin in his time on the grounds of corruption and immorality. Neither the Pāli Canon nor the Hindu texts are sufficient to enable us to test the validity of these implied criticisms.

What the Buddha does tell us – both through his implied criticism of the brahmin and the conditions established for him which enabled him to be portrayed as a unique religious figure in relation to his peers – is that the brahmins had so successfully made themselves into the embodiment of tradition that they were treated as the natural and legitimate heirs of cultural transmission. No other conclusion can be drawn from the texts' portrayal of the Buddha in a posture constantly superior to the brahmins in wisdom and from the lack of emotion attributed to him in the face of brāhmaṇical anger.

Folk religion and cosmology: meeting of two thought worlds

The image of Buddhism which has been inherited from past cultural perceptions is dominated by the austere and authoritative figure of the monk; and this image of practice is supplemented by a virtuoso tradition of spiritual cultivation. This tradition is embodied in a rigorous set of intellectual propositions about the mind, the world and action, alongside rigorous meditational techniques to plumb the deepest truths.

Of course, there is much in it that belies the real character of Buddhism in history, and it is increasingly contested. It is true that the act of becoming a monk can be seen as a cutting off of all the intellectual, social and economic ties that would bind a person, and that vipassanā meditation in particular may be seen as a method of reversing acculturation. But a Leitmotif of our discussion so far has been that the Buddhist monks and laity inhabited a range of thought worlds and cultural milieux. Acceptance of the Buddha's intellectual message, however qualified, did not automatically mean rejection of the totality of the thought world into which one was born, and which was embodied in one's habitus. Even if some monks managed successfully to become single-minded in their religious pursuits, they were still required to deal, often daily, with others who had not and did not wish to.

The Pāli texts are absolutely filled with references to other meaning systems competing within the same cultural arena. Already we have touched in passing on those of the Jains and the Ājīvikas, and on brahmanism in some detail. They are the most well profiled in the texts, probably because they very early on caught the imagination of the elites in society. But lurking in the background, lying behind all of these and enjoying a complex and fragmented relation with them, were the various religious beliefs scholars often refer to misleadingly as 'folk religion'. We might choose to regard the references in the texts to gods, bhūtas, yakṣas, nāgas, tree deities and sacred festivals of all kinds as a concession to popular belief, to the world of the ordinary folk who were struck dumb by the complexities of Buddhist metaphysics. This interpretation has often enough been advanced. But it both underrates the capacity of laypeople to cope with complex theological ideas and overestimates the extent to which a monk could deny his inherited past. Most of all it fails to allow us to place Buddhism within its total context, that of daily life, which must be its most important context of all, even if the least studied. Our purpose in this chapter is to bring together some of the fragmentary strands of beliefs and practices associated with non-metaphysical and (in the narrow sense) non-brāhmaṇical belief, hoping to suggest some of the features of a more sensitive understanding of the thought world in which the Buddha's contemporaries lived.

RELIGION AND BELIEF, COGNITIVE AND AFFECTIVE

It is necessary first to look critically at the modern habit of identifying religion with belief. This must be done in order to distance ourselves from some of the inappropriate categories built into the cultural vocabulary of modern western thought.

There are, of course, different meanings of belief. Belief in can be seen as an aspect of practical religion, or alternatively as an aspect of intensely private commitment; belief that can be contrasted with both of these, as an abstract intellectual claim. In modern western society, religion has quite widely (though no doubt inappropriately) come to be seen as reducible to adherence to a set of propositions. The reciting of the Creed, after all, encourages the outsider to think of Christianity as something that can be summed up in this way. When we turn to meaning systems in other cultures, it comes naturally to treat them as systems of thought about what is ultimately true. The role of philosophy in Buddhist history particularly encourages the enquirer to treat Buddhism as an intellectual pursuit. It should be clear enough from all that has gone before that this is very far from the case.

However, there is more to this than is likely to be obvious so far. Religions usually comport cosmological ideas, which are developed or adapted for their followers; and cosmology at least, belief about the way the world works, seems to be both an essential part of the meaning of a religion and something expressible in propositions capable of being accorded truth-value. But this too is misleading. Cosmology, belief about the way the world works, has, in modern society, come as close as any culture has attained to neutral intellectual functions. Scientific propositions are not supposed to reflect social ideas; they are supposed to reflect laws of nature. Of course, this is ideal rather than reality, and for some time now reflective scholarship has explored with finesse the ways in which 'scientific' beliefs are moulded by social forces. Every science periodically turns out to have been based upon paradigms now shown by evidence to be inappropriate, and new paradigms subtly responsive to current attitudes to the universe must be adopted. All this is familiar; but it remains fair to contrast the habits of thought in modern culture with those of most traditional cultures.

In the case of traditional cultures, it comes naturally to us to suppose that people 'believe' the cosmological propositions comported by their religion in just the same way as we 'believe' that there are elephants in Africa or that monsoon winds in India bring seasonal rain. Ancient Indians, or the people of traditional 'unmodernized' societies today, are similarly supposed to accept the existence of particular gods, or of principles of magical manipulation, in the same way and with the same confidence. It is therefore a little disturbing when people in traditional cultures evince the same sort of scepticism about the efficacy of magic rituals that a modern westerner might. When rain duly followed a rain ritual performed by !Kung Bushmen, anthropologists asked if the ritual had caused the rain, and were greeted with ridicule.¹ Another example would be the case of an old village woman commenting that it was a waste of time for the menfolk to make a ritual pilgrimage to the Ganges for water – the village well would have produced water just as good for their purposes.² Or again, an African tribesman hurrying home pauses a moment to tie together a bundle of grass beside his path, a symbol of delay supposed to ensure that dinner at his home is not started before he arrives; but we are told that he knows perfectly well that the act of tying these shoots has no actual direct effect on events at home.³ So why does he do it?

An obvious way of dealing with such cases is to say that some people in the societies we study have been contaminated by the values of the modern world, by the visiting anthropologist if not by other agencies sooner; but it does not always work very well and should not be regarded as necessarily correct. The old woman in the Indian village is supposed to be more tradition-bound, surely, than the younger folk going on pilgrimage. The African man still ties his grass, though he ought to conclude from his attitude to the belief that it is a waste of time. There must be another motivation.

The explanation, surely, is just that people behave in ways that imply certain beliefs as a way of fitting together an image of the world they live in. Gombrich's distinction between cognitive and affective beliefs is to the point;⁴ he discusses the offerings (pūjā) (usually flowers, incense or lights) made to Buddha images and relics by certain modern Ceylonese communities. Such offerings are commonly accompanied by prayers in Pāli. The ceremonies, in varying degrees, imply the treatment of the Buddha as a super-monk or as an emperor, and sometimes clearly as a living, potentially dangerous, presence. These attitudes represent affective belief; however, they are arguably in conflict with the cognitive beliefs that go with Theravāda professions – the Buddha is not supposed to be a living presence. Individuals engaged in pūjā often know the doctrine and seek to explain their actions in harmony with it.

¹ Cited by M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: an analysis of concepts of pollution and taboo (Routledge and Kegan Paul, London, 1966), p. 58.

² D. Miller, personal communication. ³ Douglas, Purity and Danger, pp. 63ff.

The underlying logic of affective beliefs, which may be inconsistent with cognitive ones, may be difficult to recognize, but it is usually there. It need not reside substantially in the overt and orthodox teaching; it may be in some ways incompatible with such professed beliefs; but it coheres at a deeper level with a cosmological scheme which is embedded in culture and is learned by socialization.

A clue to the character of affective beliefs is furnished by the concept of an 'anthropic' cosmology. This term has been applied to meaning systems in which the course of events, the things that happen to people in their lives, can be explained by anthropocentric principles. That is, the causes of events are not random, not coldly impersonal, not blind to human desires or merits; they conform to a pattern that makes human sense, they serve moral purposes or answer human needs. Instinctively and affectively, people tend to subscribe to such systems. We find the instinct attested by the saying that there is no such thing as an atheist on a sinking ship, or in popular attitudes to Buddha images, in Theravāda or Mahāyāna contexts alike. Perhaps, the more impersonal the principles of a publicly accepted cosmology, the more people are likely to reach out for an anthropic version of it, either by reinterpreting official belief, or by digging up anthropic principles from somewhere else in their cultural heritage.

The meaning of 'affective' beliefs does not primarily reside in the specific formal propositions they imply (such as 'the Buddha is a living accessible being' or 'the tying of this grass will slow down dinner preparations at home' or 'if I touch wood the thing I fear will not happen'). Their meaning resides in the actions expressing them, and these actions have value in articulating, confirming and reinforcing a total (anthropic) world view that makes sense of human experience and offers the possibility of predicting and controlling it. The effect of an action is not so much a specific, perhaps magical, result produced directly; it is rather to assert the validity of the entire cosmological scheme within which order can be imposed upon experience and related to human desire or merit. This assertion has value for the individual by making sense of the confusing and by mitigating fear or suffering. The cognitive content of a formal system of cosmological belief may be virtually diametrically opposed to some affective beliefs.

⁴ R. Gombrich, Precept and Practice. Traditional Buddhism in the Rural Highlands of Ceylon (Oxford University Press, London, 1971), pp. 114–40.

THE NEED FOR A COSMOLOGY OF ORDER AND MEANING

Human experience of reality has jagged edges that often bewilder, frighten or hurt (a fact which itself is in a sense the starting point of Buddhist teaching), but human culture everywhere dedicates itself to the elaboration of schemes of order that contain and make manageable the booming, buzzing confusion, explain and justify the hurt. A grid of order is laid over the perceived disorder, and a means created to interpret experience in rational ways.

Religious symbols provide assurance of the existence of ways to reduce suffering. For example, a Navaho curing rite is directed to sustaining an effect which 'rests ultimately on its ability to give the stricken person a vocabulary in which to grasp the nature of his distress and relate it to the wider world'.⁵ The dramatic Barong-Rangda ritual in Bali is not in origin just an aesthetic performance; it produces religious states of mind and reveals to participants the inherent ordered structure of the world.⁶ In various ways, religious belief orders and explains tragic or unpredictable events by giving them a meaning which is not necessarily a causal explanation but an assurance of meaning.⁷

Religious statements are not to be read on a surface level; they point to subtle connections between things and qualities that constitute a framework of order.⁸ To an extent greater than we usually notice, the will to ⁵ C. Geertz, 'Religion as a cultural system', in The Interpretation of Cultures (Basic Books, New York, 1973), p. 105.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 114-17. ⁷ Ibid., pp. 123ff.

⁸ 'A man who says he is a parakeet is, if he says it in normal conversation, saying that, as myth and ritual demonstrate, he is shot through with parakeetness and that this religious fact has some crucial social implications - we parakeets must stick together, not marry one another, not eat mundane parakeets, and so on . . . this placing of proximate acts in ultimate contexts . . . alters, often radically, the whole landscape presented to common sense, alters it in such a way that the moods and motivations induced by religious practice seem themselves supremely practical, the only sensible ones to adopt given the way things "really" are.' Ibid., p. 121.

fit experience within a known scheme of understanding and expectation can dominate what is given to the senses, censoring and selecting to create an ordered world. Of course there are limits; and whenever brute creation threatens the security people feel within their construction of order, they instinctively turn to ('anthropic') affirmations of the whole scheme.

Some societies, for political and social reasons, have a greater need than others to favour public rituals, but no society or culture can do entirely without rituals in some sense, for the act which affirms the validity of the whole scheme or declares its application to a particular experience is a ritual act. Rituals cannot obliterate unwanted realities, but can make them acceptable; in many societies for example it is made possible to cope with the pain of childbirth or the anguish of mourning by elaborate ritual observances which accompany them.⁹

ORDER AND ABSENCE OF ORDER

The imposition of a constructed world upon the facts of experience naturally produces tensions, and these are perceived in cosmological terms as expressions of the eternal antagonism between order and absence of order. Every cosmology expresses, in one way or another, the polarization of order and absence of order, form and formlessness.¹⁰ Such polarizations may not be constantly in the forefront of daily consciousness, but ritual and myth, when they express cosmology, bring out in an abstract sense the structure of such polarities that is, perhaps, embedded deep within the psyche.

All or most cosmologies recognize the extreme importance of closing the gaps between the ordered structures of time and place which pattern the world; social groups that are subject to the forces favouring ritual will do this abundantly in ritual ways, while more secular cultures will prefer the symbolism of inner states. Rituals commonly identify as dangerous the various in-between places and states, such as the suspension between two stages of life enacted in an initiation, or pregnancy, or the shedding of menstrual blood; Mary Douglas points to the sense of danger often provoked by these things.¹¹ There is danger in formlessness, uncategorizability, undefined gaps. Menstrual blood, for example, is regarded as what could have become life, but did not; it is between life and not-life. Festivals marking the end of one year and the beginning of another often involve the warding off of chaotic dark forces pressing into the gap. Eclipses are in-between states; in Indian tradition, a vigorous ritual commotion must be made to scare off demons.

⁹ The vexed question of divine kingship needs to be seen in this context. To say that Indians, or anybody else, believed that their kings were gods does not mean that people treated their rulers in practice as superhuman beings, gullibly accepting absurd claims. History demonstrates otherwise. What the ritual assertion of divine kingship suggests is that people accepted a total cosmology within which kingship was a divine function. This was a theory which helped make sense of the experience of state power. In dealing with actual kings in the real world, though, people used the cognitive parts of their minds.

¹⁰ F. B. J. Kuiper abstracts from the earliest Vedic texts an evolving scheme of order and absence of order, with the gods presiding over the world of being, sat, as it superseded absence of order, asat. In his reconstruction it is a set of abstractions, but many texts and rituals show its transformation into empirical categories framing other ideas and practices. See his Varuṇa and Vidūṣaka. On the Origin of the Sanskrit Drama (North Holland, Amsterdam, 1979), ch. 1.

Such ideas necessarily find expression in underlying affective cosmological belief, whether or not a culture is highly ritualized. We have to recognize how even the austere and impersonal culture of early Buddhism fitted into a social world where the polarity of form and formlessness governed cosmological perceptions. To be sure, it is all but impossible for us today to enter imaginatively into the thoughts of those who first sallied forth, pra-vraj, as mendicant wanderers passing through tracts of wilderness, for the world that surrounds us has so little left in it of raw nature; it is a construct, an artifact. What we must also remember is that the priests and monks who wrote down the literature on which we depend for our knowledge of ancient religion were also separated by a cultural abyss from the world of the early śramaṇas. An urban revolution, still under way in the Buddha's time, had long been completed, transforming the cultural landscape in which they lived. When the scriptures were first written down, huge tracts of land had been tamed and brought beneath the plough, and the scholarly classes had become accustomed to life in cloisters situated within a short stroll of massive city fortifications or busy markets.

The cosmology of their civilization, however, preserved a lively sense of the duality of forest and town, human settlement and wilderness, a duality which was built into society's perception of the operation of cosmic forces. Until comparatively recent times, the wilderness has always loomed around the edges of consciousness, often within walking distance in any direction; it was a permanent presence with its lurking dangers and opportunities, reminding people that the world of order and artifice was an unstable and hard-won creation beset by the unpredictable forces of nature.

The Ganges valley is bare and tamed now, following continuous deforestation over millennia, most especially in the last two centuries, but it has not always been so. In Vedic times there was dense luxuriant forest. The area of the Indus-Ganges divide, between the Gagghar and the Gandak, ¹¹ Douglas, Purity and Danger, pp. 94–113.

was a wooded area, made cultivable by fire. Hastināpura, the Kuru capital, was in the forest; the Pāṇḍavas were said to have cleared forest to build Indraprastha; the Pañcāla kingdom was described as being in the Kuru jungle.¹² According to Lal, pollen records from Hastināpura show a variety of botanical species to have flourished in ancient times which are now found only in the Nepalese tarai; the region was 'quite densely forested' before the Christian era, and the fauna attested, including numerous carnivores, was consistent only with a thick forest cover as late as the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries ACE.¹³ There are references in the Pāli literature to four 'great forests' (mahārañña) occupying parts of northeastern India.¹⁴ We have the testimony of Hsüan-tsang that the area between Allahabad and Kausambi was still densely forested at the time of his visit in the seventh century ACE: 'From Prayāga the pilgrim went . . . through a forest infested by wild elephants and other fierce animals.'¹⁵ As Deloche said, 'The forest appears, more than the mountains, the desert and the rivers, to have been the principal barrier to the movement of men.'¹⁶

Even the most urbane of urbanites at any time during our period, therefore, was permanently aware of the forces of untamed nature always lurking on the edges of civilized life. Society itself was envisaged as patterned by the classical duality of settled and wild lands, each with its own lifestyle. Some classes of people frequented the wild places, and were on that account seen as separate, governed by a different sort of ethic. As J. C. Heesterman has put it, 'While the family and caste were at home in the agricultural village, the wastes were the home of the warrior and his war band.'¹⁷ Kṣatriya leaders jealous of their autonomy have always liked to make the forest tracts their stamping-ground; Rajput leaders within more recent centuries have even preserved belts of forest around their fortresses, and with different motives communities of forest monks seek to re-create the wilderness environment in patches of woodland that are artificially preserved around the vihāra.¹⁸ In the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa, we find that the forest which surrounds the ¹² M. Lal, 'Population distribution and its movement during the second-first millennium B.C. in the Indo-Gangetic divide and Upper Ganga plain', Purātattva, 18 (1987-8), p. 38.

¹³ Ibid., p. 50. ¹⁴ S. Sharma, Material Culture, p. 102.

¹⁵ T. Watters (trans. and ed.), Yuan Chwang's Travels in India (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1961), p. 365.

¹⁶ J. Deloche, La Circulation en Inde, avant la Révolution des Transports (École Française D'Extrême-Orient, Paris, 1980), vol. 1, p. 7.

¹⁷ J. C. Heesterman, 'Was there an Indian reaction? Western expansion in Indian perspective', in H. Wesseling (ed.), Expansion and Reaction: Essays on European Expansion and Reaction in Asia and Africa (Leiden University Press, Leiden, 1978), p. 47.

¹⁸ The forest movement in northeastern Thailand illustrates this. For example, Wat Pah Nanachat outside Ubon is in a patch of woodland surrounded by paddy fields.

site of a sacrifice is a haunt of dangerous powers natural and unnatural – ogres, man-tigers, thieves, murderers and robbers –, and some sacrifices are said to be able to annihilate the wilderness tracts separating villages.¹⁹

The polarity of settlement and wilderness is a valuable clue to the organizing principles of the ancient Indian thought world. It is at work in Vedic society, where the terms grāma and araṇya carry connotations that are as much psychological as environmental: the one signifies order, familiarity, predictability, and the other (traceable to Indo-European al*, ol*, and related to words meaning ‘other’ such as alter) represents otherness, separation, in-between space. The Vedic araṇya meant a distant land, and by the time of the Atharva Veda acquired its meaning of ‘forest’, ‘desert’, ‘wilderness’. Araṇya means the opposite of human settlement – ‘das Fremde, das Feindliche’, whereas the term vana was, up to the time of the earlier Upaniṣads, quite different, referring to areas around settlements.²⁰ In the Vedic sacrifice, sacrificial animals from the wilderness, araṇya, are placed in spaces between the sacrificial posts; on the other hand the domesticated fire, agni (which burns up the forest), represents the village order with its familiar patterns and seasonal cyclic repetition.²¹

The wilderness stood for chance, unpredictability, the primal lack of order whose raw energy could be a source of awful power if subdued, but was dangerous in the extreme to whoever would tangle with its forces. The people who lived there were people apart, alienated, outsiders. According to the Āpastamba Śrauta Sūtra, the wilderness, araṇya, was a place of ‘retirement, isolation or banishment’.

The meditations of brāhmanical hermits on the self, ātman, draw on the powers of the wilderness, and the later development of the concept of vanaprastha, the woodland-dwelling life of the recluse, Malamoud argues, is a utopian combination of the forces of wilderness and settlement, marrying family life and routine sacrifices with closeness to nature and an ethic of non-injury to living beings, ahiṃsā.²² Upaniṣads associate the two cosmic principles with the two Vedic paths followed in the afterlife, leading respectively to the world of the forefathers and that of the gods: those who carry out their observances in the forest go to the world of the gods, and thence to the sun and the fire of lightning, while those who live in the ¹⁹ Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa 13.2.4.2–4.

²⁰ J. F. Sprockhoff, ‘Āraṇyaka und Vanaprastha in der vedische Literatur’, WZKSA, 25 (1981), p. 84.

²¹ Malamoud, ‘Village et forêt’, pp. 5, 9, 13 and passim. Some sacrificial spoons, associated with village animals, are used repeatedly; others, associated with wild animals, are thrown away after a single use (see p. 13).

²² Ibid., pp. 11–20.

village and carry out sacrifices return to earth.²³ Jain texts commemorate the same polarity of village and wilderness.²⁴

That the symbolism of kingship came to embrace the subjection of the forces of the wilderness therefore follows logically; kings both subdued them and maintained them as a source of power. Nancy Falk has argued for a cosmological link between royal power and wilderness: 'It appears that a king had to have some kind of transaction with the wilderness and the beings that inhabit it to acquire or hold his kingship.'²⁵ Among the forms taken by this relationship, it is worth noticing the importance of the shrine in the royal park, symbol of wilderness, where a throne consisting of a stone slab constitutes a ritual focus for the king's absorption of cosmic energies.²⁶ The special role of the king's pleasure park is commemorated in the Jātakas: he receives homage from wild creatures there, and his occupancy of its throne legitimizes his rule.²⁷ Royal patron deities were sometimes associated with the wilderness spirits: Jagannāth was originally a forest god, and the Buddha tooth relic has been traced back to a yakṣa cult.²⁸

It is quite clear that the rootless lifestyle of the early Buddhist monks made them familiar with the ways of the wilderness; they were professionally required to confront its dangers, and no doubt they were widely perceived to absorb its powers. Certainly, many monks, including the Buddha himself, must have wandered through forests and wasteland, but the later career of the Buddha seems to have tended much more to an itinerary that led to and from urban centres, accompanied by an entourage. Nonetheless, the connection between the wandering monk and the ambiguous powers of the forest remains integral to the image and style of the holy man's career.

The Jātakas are a rich source of information about the types of people who made their living in the frontier areas – pioneer villagers, foresters, hunters, sometimes carpenters, and often enough refugees²⁹ or ²³ BṛhU 6.2.15ff.; ChU 5.10.1–3.

²⁴ J. Bronkhorst, The Two Traditions of Meditation in Ancient India (Steiner, Stuttgart, 1986), p. 29, citing the Āyāraṅga Sūtra.

²⁵ N. Falk, 'Wilderness and kingship in ancient South Asia', HR, 13 (1974), p. 1.

²⁶ J. Auboyer, Le trône et son symbolisme dans l'Inde ancienne (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1949), esp. pp. 51–61. The royal throne is absorbed within the evolution of the iconography of the altar and linked with the spirits of sacred trees in consecrated spots. It is invested (pp. 61ff.) with mythical value and is considered to be the predestined seat of a great being.

²⁷ JIV 40, V 247ff., VI 39, where strangers destined for kingship are discovered lying on the stone slab in the royal park; II 227, where a king receives the homage of fish and tortoises in his park.

²⁸ Falk, 'Wilderness and kingship'.

²⁹ JII 356, IV 306ff., where the bodhisattva dwells in seclusion, in one case as a tree spirit in the forest. On Jātaka references to forest dwellers in general see Tracy Taylor, 'The Interaction of the Settled and Wild Lands, According to the Jātakas' (unpublished thesis, Monash University, 1983), pp. 27–9, and passim.

exiles.³⁰ Unassimilated tribal communities lived in the forest areas, as they have until modern times, and relations with them were constantly a complex and vexatious problem for kings;³¹ the AS at a number of points gives advice about the treatment of such tribes, āṭavika.³² Buddhist monks constantly passed through the wilderness in their wanderings, though naturally they could not take up residence, even briefly, far from the settlements upon which they depended for their food; but these settlements were often enough small outlying hamlets in the hinterland areas.³³ Buddhist monks might lodge with the nomadic groups of cattle herders, moving when the herdsmen moved.³⁴

To judge from the Jātakas, Buddhists knew the wilderness well. It was regarded as a place of untamed spirits, especially yakṣas.³⁵ The concept underlying the figure of a yakṣa perhaps connoted primal lack of order, as represented also by the waters that frame the cosmos; upon the waters reclines the figure of the creator deity, sometimes called a yakṣa; from his body the gods arose.³⁶ The forest is a place of animals, spirits and birds.³⁷ It is especially a place of danger from spirits, exciting fear and numinous dread which must be quelled by meditation:

So I . . . stayed in such frightening places as park-shrines, forest-shrines, tree-shrines. As I was staying there, brahmin, either an animal came along, or a peacock broke off a twig, or the wind rustled the fallen leaves. It occurred to me: 'Surely this is fear and dread coming . . . Why am I staying longing for nothing but fear?'³⁸

Merchants passing through were doubtless impelled by the hope of profits, but they did not like it.³⁹ Some of the dangers no doubt were mundane ones, like those of Sherwood Forest while Robin Hood was at large, but others were supernatural, and no very sharp distinction was made between different types of danger. Jātakas tell us stories of the adventures that befell travellers in wild places: one merchant was tricked by a malicious spirit into ³⁰ Certainly it is a recurrent theme of Indian literature that victims of successful conquerors should be banished for long periods. See R. Thapar, 'The Rāmāyaṇa: theme and variation', in S. Mukherjee (ed.), India: History and Thought (Subarnarakha, Calcutta, 1982), pp. 221–53.

³¹ J II 74 (a border rebellion); see also Taylor, Settled and Wild Lands, p. 43, for Jātaka references to frontier problems.

³² AS 9.2, for example, advises a ruler on the circumstances in which it is appropriate to recruit wild tribes into his army.

³³ Vin III 46 defines 'village' (gāma) as a settlement of any size starting from one hut, or two, three or four huts; though part of the old commentary, this passage may be late.

³⁴ Vin I 152: monks could stay in a cow pen, vaja, and move on with it when it was moved.

³⁵ Taylor, Settled and Wild Lands, p. 14.

³⁶ A. K. Coomaraswamy, Yakṣas (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1971), part II, p. 25.

³⁷ J V 416. Creatures dwelling in the region are listed, and immediately after animal species come 'horse-faced yakkhas, sprites, goblins and ogres'.

³⁸ MI 20ff. ³⁹ For example, MI 276.

throwing away his drinking-water; a group of merchants died of poisonous wild fruit; bands of robbers fell upon hapless travellers passing through; captives were taken, and ransom demands made; plundering war-bands emerging from the wilderness raided villages and caused the villagers to run away.⁴⁰ The famous Buddhist convert, Āṅgulimāla, had in his career of crime caused villages to become 'non-villages' in this way.⁴¹ Whilst we have no way of generating crime statistics for ancient India, it is still the case that the fear of the forest was not based just on the ambiguity intended by supernatural powers, but equally on real physical danger, the cause of which could be easily ascertained.

Now, in all this, we can recognize the foundations of a cosmological structure that is essential to the world view of the people upon whose support the śramaṇa orders depended, a world view which inevitably moulded the evolution of religious attitudes and behaviour.

PERSONAL AND IMPERSONAL COSMIC FORCES

We need first to recognize the division of beliefs into those that postulate gods or spirits, beings possessed of will and consciousness, capable of recognizing prayers or insults and of influencing human life, and those that postulate impersonal processes, inanimate forces that operate according to their own laws regardless of human interests, potentially dangerous if uncontrolled but capable of being manipulated by the use of special knowledge. The latter are sometimes left altogether out of account in any enquiry into religion, or if noticed they may be considered to represent a debased or inferior sort of religion, called magic. Both approaches are mistaken.

In the world view that developed under the influence of these cosmological principles, then, there were two types of power affecting human life, the impersonal and the personal. Quite a long time ago now, Durkheim recognized this well enough. He sought to give causal and chronological priority to the impersonal conceptions of religion; without necessarily following him in this, we can recognize the perceptiveness with which he analysed the intermeshing of personal and impersonal forces in the cosmologies of traditional religious beliefs.⁴²

⁴⁰ J II 295ff., where a nāga lord slays merchants in a forest; II 335ff., where a merchant caravan is attacked in the forest by a robber band. See also Taylor, Settled and Wild Lands, p. 24.

⁴¹ M II 97, 100.

⁴² E. Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, trans. J. W. Swain (Free Press, New York, 1965), pp. 229ff., 'What we find at the origin and basis of religious thought are . . . indefinite powers, anonymous forces . . . whose impersonality is strictly comparable to that of the physical forces whose manifestations the sciences of nature study . . . so it is not surprising that even in the religions where

In the Indian cosmology, where form and order must be imposed upon a threatening disorder or lack of order, we find that the formlessness of the wilderness is characterized, and in large measure defined, by the disordered mingling of the personal and the impersonal; the form and order of human life in society is characterized by the proper separation and demarcation of the personal and the impersonal.

It may not be going too far to suggest that, at least in Buddhist thought, the same distinction needed to be made in the imposition of order upon the mind. It is precisely the intermeshing of purpose and sentience with mindless thinghood that gives an edge of numinous dread to the encounter with disordered nature. The spirits that haunt the forests, mountains and deserts have consciousness and can do us harm or good, but their personalities are apt to dissolve into faceless, remorseless energies. Conversely, the elements of blind nature that embody the cycles of day and season have within them germs of purpose and consciousness that need to be negotiated with; it is always possible that real communication can be established with them by the use of expert knowledge. It is just this ambivalence of personality and thinghood that makes the dark unpredictability of raw nature dangerous and frightening.

On the other hand, the realm of settled order is established by the clear demarcation of unambiguously inanimate things or forces and unambiguously conscious beings; the latter are able confidently to manipulate the former. Boundaries are drawn, ritually and juridically. There are familiar gods whose behaviour is more or less predictable, and therefore capable of being managed by appropriate ritual. Magic is technology, which can be learned by apprenticeship to a specialist. Life is capable, often if in practice not always, of being planned and made predictable.

The old problem of the nature of the R̥gvedic religion illustrates the pattern. Though Max Müller's concept of henotheism may have been false to the real character of the old Vedic cult, he had a point. The Vedic gods were indeed seen as stable conscious individuals, each unique and separate, and thus far belonging to the domesticated religion of the ordered microcosm, but they were not completely and safely personalized. They were envisaged in part as clusters of transferable properties (creation, shining, killing demons, giving life etc.); in a sense they were not so much unique there are avowed divinities, there are rites having an efficient virtue in themselves, independently of all divine intervention . . . Even should [the energy of this efficient virtue] happen to concentrate itself especially in a rite, this will become a creator of divinities from that very fact. That is why there is scarcely a divine personality who does not retain some impersonality . . . Zeus is in each of the raindrops which falls, just as Ceres is in each of the sheaves of the harvest.'

individuals as nodes in a web of impersonal forces. Their fierce and often dangerous powers meant that they were always imperfectly tamed and domesticated; they were still liable to retreat into the forces of raw nature. It is this, indeed, that imparts a glimmer of truth to the old simplistic conception of Vedic religion as worship of nature; but this perception identifies only one pole, from which the gods were receding under the influence of myth and ritual. It was the prescriptions of the Brāhmaṇa texts that effectively bottled the gods' personalities within the confines of a set of rules which could not be transgressed; the gods became uninteresting, and the activities of the priest all-important.

A further development was liable to take place with the increasing elaboration of an ideology of domestication and order. The effect of confinement by rules, of ritual power over the environment, was in the first place to separate the personal from the impersonal, so that sentient beings (including gods and spirits, and the inhabitants of the other realms to which a being might go for rebirth) were clearly distinguished from the inanimate elements and forces of nature; but in the long run the ritual worked against the true autonomy of sentient beings, who were liable to retreat to the status of passive components within a deterministic system. The Vedic gods suffered this fate early, to the extent that they were tamed and subordinated by the mechanisms of brāhmaṇical ritual.

Ultimately, the same process of depersonalization could engulf all beings as they came to be seen as instruments of a cosmic order. What used to be vital purposeful forces could turn into intellectual abstractions. (Māra, lord of the underworld, for example, could turn into a metaphor for transmigration; a stūpa could become a diagram to aid recollection and meditation; human personality could turn into an elaborate psychological chart tabulating interactions between various defined components in successive moments.) In modern industrial culture, materialist philosophies such as mind-brain identity theory have advanced the process practically as far as it can go, though philosophical puzzles remain.

This complex cycle of relationships is something implicit in the cosmology which Indians more or less instinctively accepted, not a map of intellectual history. Any particular doctrine may take its place in a number of different cosmological contexts, and be reinterpreted accordingly. Thus, although it is certainly useful to think of Buddhism and the śramaṇa movements as emerging, in some sense, from the unpredictable and unbounded environment of the wilderness, and of brāhmaṇical religion as belonging to the ritually circumscribed order of settlement, there are many complications. Something of the original danger and energy of primal forces may still be felt by ordinary devotees to inhere in any religious artifact or concept,⁴³ while for the scholarly monk that same thing may be little more than an intellectualization; and different religious traditions or styles of life can be related to the cosmic environment of personhood, thinghood or abstraction in different ways.

It is easy enough to recognize the values of brāhmanical tradition in the minutely regulated religious environment of settlement, where disorder is kept at bay, the cosmos can be mapped, and divine forces are predictable and familiar. But major qualifications have to be made. For one thing, brahmanism was not a simple monolithic structure; with the concept of the fourth stage of life, it incorporated within itself the originally alien values of the holy man in the wilderness. For another, the individuality of gods within the system did not remain static: no sooner did ritual threaten to erase their personality altogether, turning them into no more than inert vehicles, than devotional religion, bhakti, came to give them back all their former autonomy, but in a different way.

In the third place, it is easy enough to recognize the values of the wandering holy man in the religious environment of the wilderness. By braving dangers and exposing himself to the powerful half-animate forces that haunt the lonely places, he absorbs power.⁴⁴ By his intense self-control, in a sense by his impersonality, he prevents the supernatural hurricane around him from tearing his being apart, and learns to control the fierce energies of the cosmos; he internalizes them, using them to obtain supernatural skills and insights. He is a living symbol of precisely defined order and predictability amidst all that is the opposite of this. This at least is the manner in which the ordinary villager is liable to regard the mendicant who comes out of the forest, his gaunt emaciated frame attesting his confrontation with powerful psychic forces. As a result of his sojourn in the wilderness he is made alien, other; he is a dweller in the spaces between, detached from the interests and concerns of ordinary humanity. He is almost a spirit himself. It is essential to recognize this context – like the experience of initiation, in a sense – if we are to make sense of the way in which śramaṇa movements such as Buddhism developed.

⁴³ See, for example, Douglas, Purity and Danger, pp. 94–113 and passim. The massive importance of the duality of form and formlessness in traditional societies is fundamental to the structure of ideas described here.

⁴⁴ This is very much like the brāhmanical concept of tapas, the mystic heat which the ascetic is able to absorb by austerities and meditation. It is important to distinguish between tapas, yoga, Buddhist meditation, and gnosis, which although they overlap a great deal in various ways are distinct techniques or concepts; but from the point of view of Indian cosmology, what matters is that the behaviour of the holy man, Buddhist or otherwise, presented the image of an ascetic building up tapas. See W. O. Kaelber, 'Tapas, birth and spiritual rebirth in the Veda', HR, 15 (1976), pp. 343–86.

BUDDHISM, FOLK RELIGION AND MAGIC

Buddhism inherited these cosmological premises without seriously criticizing them, and Buddhist literature presents us with the same duality: wilderness spirits that are not clearly animate or inanimate, and the microcosm of the settled community, within which the animate and the inanimate are kept apart.

This way of regarding the background of belief about cosmic principles makes sense of some of the ambiguities we meet in Buddhist texts. For example, the Buddhist concept of the nāga oscillates teasingly between snake, human and superhuman; Rawlinson has argued that the oscillations represent not a multiplicity of discrepant traditions but different manifestations of a consistent cosmology in which both personal beings (including devas) and abstract principles are manifested in a hierarchy of forms linked by correspondences of essential nature. Thus the nāga deva becomes the principle of water and is equivalent to sap, semen, soma and fire, and is embodied in snakes and in certain people whose nature possesses the appropriate qualities (fiery, sharp, fierce and so forth).⁴⁵

Buddhism came out of the wilderness, and was domesticated. It also domesticated the forces of the wilderness. These are symbolized, for example, by the figures of Aṅgulimāla and the yakkhas, tamed in various ways by the Buddha.⁴⁶ We cannot doubt that many generations of Buddhist monks and followers believed (or instinctively accepted, having in their bones a profound sense of the ubiquity of cosmic forces) that it brought with it an armoury of powers that might be animate or inanimate or an explosive mixture of both. Such powers were commemorated in Buddhist stories of gods and spirits, in the potency of ritual designs in art, iconography and architecture, in the cult of relics. Some scholars emphasize the monastic, scholarly tradition which made abstractions of these things, graphic reminders to the faithful of facts or qualities upon which they should meditate.⁴⁷ The scholarly monks, however, had to contend with the concrete realities of early Buddhism, which inevitably imported the unquestioned cosmological assumptions of its original cultural context and was perceived as bringing powerful forces out of the wilderness; what followed was a movement towards order and separation that came with domestication, sanitizing all the more strange or dangerous supernatural forces by turning them into laws of nature, eventually making of them intellectual abstractions.

⁴⁵ A. Rawlinson, 'Nāgas and the magical cosmology of Buddhism', Religion, 16 (1986), p. 144.

⁴⁶ Bailey, 'Problems'.

⁴⁷ J. Masson, La religion populaire dans le canon Bouddhique Pāli (Muséon, Louvain, 1942), distinguishes at many points between a popular type of religion which made its way into Buddhism to be accepted, rejected or transformed, and a scholarly type which made of mythical or divine beings allegories or philosophical categories. See for example pp. 109–13.

One thing that Buddhism brought out of the wilderness was never wholly domesticated, although it came eventually to be ignored in practice by the overwhelming majority of all Buddhists – the doctrine of non-self, anātman or anatta. Of course, other śramaṇa movements with claims at least as strong to have found their truth in lonely places came up with different doctrines about the ontology of the self, but it is interesting that most of these doctrines shared a concern to dissolve the soul of man into thinghood. Among the new schools of holy men, Buddhism carried out perhaps the most systematic campaign to invert the teachings of brahmanism, and the Upaniṣadic glorification of the One, ātman, found its photo-negative in the Buddhist denial of any substantial immortal soul.

Such a claim, along with the ‘materialistic’ teachings of the Ājīvikas and others, should not be read as a simple reduction of the animate to the inanimate, a rejection of the ghost in favour of the machine (though in its most abstract and intellectual forms it came close). After all, the categories of Cartesian dualism do not precisely correspond to the categories of the ancient Indian thought world. The amorphous energies that haunt the wilderness belong to a primal chaos prior to categories; will and consciousness are not integrated within unique self-contained personalities but are stirred into a mixture of elements and impulses, physical and immaterial; and this mixture cannot adequately be described as animate or inanimate. Here divine energies move restlessly, without attachment to any abode; they are the wind that howls in desert places, vāyu, which was equated with the breath that quite literally constitutes the self, ātman.⁴⁸ Something of this ambiguity clings to the vision offered by the holy men. When the Buddha declined to say whether the soul is identical with the body or not, his chief purpose was probably to reinforce his constant emphasis upon practice, not metaphysics; but if the question were one that could be answered straightforwardly, without any complexity to detain the intellect and prompt a metaphysical enquiry, the demands of practice would not have been compromised by an answer. The fact is that, clearly enough, ⁴⁸ Malamoud, ‘Village et forêt’, pp. 3–20.

the Buddha and his disciples sensed an ambiguity that hung over the status of an individual's existence, an ambiguity that plagued the subsequent course of Buddhist teaching, and an ambiguity which had its origin in the otherness, the in-betweenness, of the empty spaces in which the dhamma found its birth. In its subsequent evolution, the doctrine of anatta turned into a preoccupation of philosophers concerned with learning rather than spiritual cultivation (pariyatti, rather than patipatti), but in its origins it was an instinctive response to the in-betweenness of the wild places where chaos rules, where everything is potential and nothing is complete. To say that personal beings exist there would be wrong; to say that they do not would be wrong too.

None of this, however, must be read as an attempt to interpret Buddhist doctrine as implied by the earliest scriptures; the Buddha was not a prophet of disorder. It is, rather, a description of the structure of the cosmos inhabited mentally by the Buddha's contemporaries, and it suggests the image presented to layfolk by the holy men who came out of the empty places to preach to townsmen.

Within the Indian thought world, then, the relationship between the animate and the inanimate was highly charged; the two terms were positive and negative poles capable of generating a powerful electricity. We need these principles for the understanding of the more abstract cosmology that was formulated within the Great Tradition and became part of the generally accepted Indian cultural heritage, including the popular or 'folk' environment within the totality of Indian religious culture.

Buddhism absorbed and digested the pre-existing Indian beliefs about the structure of the cosmos. It was a structure that postulated a cosmic order won from the primal absence of order that confounded personal and impersonal principles; in this cosmic order the gods presided over the continuing stability of the system. Cosmography pictured the world as an arrangement of four continents, or of seven ring-shaped continents separated by oceans, around a central point where Meru (Pāli Sineru), mountain of the gods, rose up towards the heavens.⁴⁹ Upon this cosmographic structure, Buddhism superimposed a scale of horizontal layers, dhātus, which are states of being reached in meditation and rising above Mount Meru as superior levels.⁵⁰ As Rawlinson said, '[I]t may well be that this magical ⁴⁹ W. Kirfel, Die Kosmographie der Inder (George Olms, Hildesheim, 1967 (Bonn and Leipzig, 1920); I. W. Mabbett, 'The symbolism of Mount Meru', HR, 23 (1983), pp. 64–83.

⁵⁰ E. Lamotte, 'Introduction à l'étude du bouddhisme de Śakyamuni d'après les textes anciens', Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen I: Philologisch-Historische Klasse, 1983, pp. 83–120.

cosmology is pre-Buddhist. But it would be wrong to think that Buddhism rejected it; the rūpadhātu and kāmadhātu of Buddhist cosmology are totally magical.⁵¹

This superimposition has been seen as a conceptually awkward conflation likely to show the combination of traditions from different sources.⁵² But, however it originated, Buddhist cosmology integrated the cosmic and psychological scales within a single vision. According to this vision, for example, the fourth dhyāna is a psychological state reached in meditation, from which enlightenment can be reached, but it is also a place, a realm within which rebirth is possible. The scheme is one which fuses what seems to the modern mind to be incommensurables, but as Peter Masefield has argued, perhaps the cosmography of tiered realms and the hierarchy of mental states should be seen not as more or less metaphorical designations of different things but as a single reality, apprehended from different points of view.⁵³ In similar vein, Rupert Gethin has argued that the Buddhist conception of states of existence does not distinguish them from states of mind.⁵⁴ The difference is one of time scale: different states of mind are reached within one lifetime; the cosmos evolves over aeons.

It would be wrong to identify the Buddhist cosmology with magic and folk culture, and divorce this from spirituality and meditation. Buddhism did not add a new mentality; it absorbed Indian cosmological traditions and reinterpreted them. It had no reason to reject the belief that power can be gained by insight into the fixed laws described by cosmology, which was a constant tributary to Indian tradition.

It is therefore important to recognize that magic – the manipulation of impersonal forces by one expert in the technology – was not something that Buddhist belief automatically rejected. The distinction between belief in impersonal principles and belief in sentient beings did not correspond to any difference between ‘superstition’ and ‘religion’. Rhys Davids, who recognized very much the same two principles and called them normalism and animism, pointed out that the former persisted through the Vedas and was represented by the magic of names, numbers, propinquity and association.⁵⁵ The Atharva Veda clearly represents the belief in power based on ⁵¹ Rawlinson, ‘Nāgas’, p. 144.

⁵² On the hybrid origins of Buddhist hierarchies of meditation states, see Bronkhorst, The Two Traditions, pp. 75–80.

⁵³ P. Masefield, ‘Mind/Cosmos maps in the Pāli Nikāyas,’ in N. Katz (ed.), Buddhist and Western Psychology (Prajñā Press, Boulder, 1983), pp. 69–93.

⁵⁴ Rupert Gethin, ‘Cosmology and meditation: from the Aggañña Sutta to the Mahāyāna,’ HR, 36 (1997), pp. 183–217.

⁵⁵ Rhys Davids, Dialogues of the Buddha, vol. III, pp. 53–8.

knowledge of a system.⁵⁶ In the Pāli Canon, this Veda does not commonly figure alongside the earlier three, but the stream of magical belief which it represents was part of the cultural furniture of India.

The ascetic tradition, to which Buddhism belonged, lay squarely within the same cultural world. The literature of other ascetic schools is full of references to magic powers; Mahāvīra and Gosāla are represented as exercising precognition and duelling with the powers born of their austerities. One episode in the Bhagavatī Sūtra, for example, has Gosāla reducing enemies to ashes by magic, and attempting unsuccessfully to do the same to Mahāvīra.⁵⁷ Within the wider community, ascetics came to be seen as workers of magic. Ascetics, classed with learned brahmins, magicians and priests of miscellaneous cults, could be engaged for such purposes as protecting against the evil effects of rats, demons, pestilences of any sort, or famine. ‘Persons acquainted with rituals of the Atharva Veda (atharvavedavido) and experts in sacred magic and mysticism shall perform such ceremonials as ward off the danger from demons.’⁵⁸ This is the world in which the monks stood forth to proclaim the dhamma. What they taught, and the roles they were able to play in society, had to fit within the same world. In the next chapter we shall explore a little further the Buddhist involvement in this world.

⁵⁶ For example, the creation of the human body is attributed to the magic action of the indwelling sacred brahman (conceived of as an impersonal force): Atharva Veda 10.2, discussed by L. Renou, Etudes Védiques et Pāṇinéennes (Boccard, Paris, 1956), vol. II, pp. 69–79. Renou emphasizes the theme of magically efficacious knowledge in the Atharva Veda.

⁵⁷ Bhagavatī Sūtra, cited by Basham, Ājīvikas, p. 60. ⁵⁸ AS 4.3.37.

Mediation

The holy man

On the working hypothesis adopted here, the Buddha taught that truth is best to be found by leading the life of a wanderer who rids himself of all attachments and cultivates an austerely simple way of life, cut off from all social ties and possessions and following the path by which the causes of suffering and rebirth can be destroyed. This original idea is not to be regarded as determining a particular defined stage of Buddhism as a whole; it is, rather, one of a number of factors that co-operated in the shaping of the movement when the Buddha began to communicate his ideas to others. Nevertheless, the idea was original and basic, and it persisted, clearly and unambiguously, in the scriptures. It must therefore have been an element in the success of Buddhism in a particular sort of social environment. The purpose of this chapter is to advance a substantially new view of the way in which Buddhism (and similar ascetic movements) could first come to secure an important social role. This interpretation requires us to acknowledge that the life of the wandering ascetic was the original ideal of the Buddhist Order, and the one by which (despite its austerity and other-worldliness) it was first able to attract substantial support in some areas. First, therefore, it is necessary to survey briefly the reasons for accepting that the original impulse driving the order was indeed an ascetic one.

THE BUDDHISTS AS ŚRAMAṆAS

Seeking to explain Buddhism's social role, scholars often ignore the Buddhist scriptures' message of ascetic withdrawal and private pursuit of salvation. One objection to doing this – an objection rarely if ever recognized – is the simple fact that this message was perfectly familiar in society at the time as an important stream in religious life, the śramaṇa movement. We cannot ignore this stream. It therefore becomes difficult indeed to treat the Buddha's ideal of the homeless life of a wandering mendicant as an exotic theoretical notion on the margins of life, irrelevant to the processes of social evolution.

There were many groupings of ascetics who sought spiritual enlightenment by wandering from place to place and living on alms. Many of them engaged in more or less severe forms of self-mortification, hoping to detach themselves from the profane world and facilitate spiritual enlightenment. The Jains and the Ājīvikas were two major groups which practised severe asceticism. The Buddha's followers similarly lived as wandering mendicants but eschewed the severer practices because they did not regard these as conducive to enlightenment; they preferred a middle way, cutting ties with society and preferring simplicity and poverty to active self-mortification.¹

So far as the Canon allows us to tell, the Buddha's path to salvation did not require the manipulation of karma as such by ascetic purification. The direct method which lay at the heart of the Buddha's message involved cutting the roots of ignorance and attachment by a special form of meditation cultivated as a method of insight.² Meditation may have been considered to produce good karma, but this was not essential to the quest for salvation; it has been argued by some that, though canonical teachings include doctrines about the Buddha's memory of past lives, this was an unsystematic borrowing from the cultural context, not an essential prop to Buddhist belief.³

This fact, if accepted, has important implications for our view of the social role of early Buddhism, for the early bhikkhus were, to the extent that they were imbued with the original ideals, simply not concerned with karmic interaction, the earning of merit as it has become institutionalized in subsequent Buddhist societies. They sought enlightenment by the short path. As Gombrich has argued, the Buddha was not a gradualist, and his message, despite its much gentler physical demands than those of the Jain teaching, called for uncompromising separation from society. 'The first Buddhists were asocial, even anti-social.'⁴

In general, the Buddhist rule was rather less strict than Ājīvika and substantially less strict than Jain practice. All were normally vegetarians by ¹ Bronkhorst's distinction between an older type of asceticism emphasizing physical austerities and the more psychological system represented by Buddhism is relevant here. Bronkhorst, The Two Traditions, pp. 76ff.

² J. W. de Jong, 'The Background of Early Buddhism', pp. 42ff. distinguishes between asceticism, yoga and shamanism, and points to the problems involved in tracing the historical origin of śramaṇa practices, which may have been influenced by the culture of non-Vedic peoples. See more recently the important insights of G. Samuel, Civilized Shamans, ch. 2.

³ R. Gombrich, 'Karma and social control', Comparative Studies in Society and History, 17 (1975), pp. 212-20.

⁴ Ibid., p.216.

preference, though both the Buddha and the Ājīvikas were ready to eat meat.⁵

Sanction is also given in the Buddhist canon for austerities of some rigour. The Buddha is said to have washed rags to make himself a robe;⁶ the Vinaya offered to monks the practices of living only on food scraps, wearing clothes taken from a dust-heap, sleeping at the foot of a tree, and using only decomposed urine as medicine; these are the four nissayas, things on which to depend.⁷ The subsequent history of Buddhism demonstrates a persistent tendency to incorporate austere practices (stopping short of fanatical self-mortification), sometimes no doubt as a self-imposed challenge to the earnestness of the ascetic, sometimes possibly as a response to the perception that rigorously ascetic holy men attracted more prestige than others. One concept that brings out clearly the tension between the two approaches is that of the dhutāṅga, a set of thirteen ascetic practices which in later Theravāda Buddhism came to be esteemed for the dedication to the soteriological quest which it represented.⁸ By the time of the Milinda Pañha, though not in canonical Buddhism, the dhutāṅgas could be recommended without qualification.⁹ Despite the Buddha's rejection of severe austerities, in places he is represented as accepting some of the dhutāṅgas if they are practised without selfish intent. In the Majjhima Nikāya, nine of the dhutāṅgas are mentioned positively.¹⁰ In one place the Buddha is said to have adopted a pragmatic attitude to the practice of austerities – it all depended whether profitable states arose in the practitioner.¹¹ Modern scholars are divided on the importance of these practices to the Buddha. In fact, what probably counted was motivation.¹²

⁵ See M. Wijayaratna, Le moine bouddhiste selon les textes du Theravada (Cerf, Paris, 1983), pp. 87ff.; Basham, Ajīvikas, pp. 122ff.

⁶ Vin I 28f., where Indra helps the Buddha make his rag robe ready.

⁷ Vin I 58, where each of the four primitive nissayas is supplemented by 'extra' allowable forms of food, clothing, dwelling and medicine which in all cases are much less austere. Cf. E. J. Thomas, The History of Buddhist Thought (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1933), p. 23.

⁸ P. V. Bapat, 'Dhutangas (or the ascetic practices of purification in Buddhism)', Indian Historical Quarterly, 13 (1937), p. 46 points to parallels with the Jain Ayaraṅga.

⁹ MP pp. 351–3 where the dhutāṅgas are praised and described as necessary for an understanding of the dharmma. See N. Tatia, 'The interaction of Jainism and Buddhism', in A. K. Narain (ed.), Studies in History (B. R. Publishing, Delhi, 1980), pp. 329ff.

¹⁰ See M III 40–2, where effectively the nine are identified among practices which do not tend to salvation if they are accompanied by a selfish attitude (implying they can be practised with an unselfish attitude).

¹¹ DI II.

¹² See R. Ray, Buddhist Saints in India, passim. C. Prebish, 'Ideal types in Indian Buddhism: a new paradigm', JAOS, 115 (1995), pp. 651–66, reviews different scholarly attitudes. On the ambiguity of the status of these practices see Friedrich-Silber, Virtuosity, Charisma, and Social Order, p. 110.

The oscillation between the heroically austere (as reflected in parts of the Theragāthā and the Sn) and the moderate within the Buddhist tradition demands that we should be clear what we mean by asceticism. There is an important difference between the rigorous self-mortification represented especially by Jain practice and the gentler lifestyle taught by the Buddhist dhamma. Here, the term 'ascetic' will be applied to both, for the Buddhist self-discipline is in principle just as strict, and demands total dedication to a life without possessions or attachments.

One aspect of a monk's asceticism (Buddhist or other) which is so basic that it is easily forgotten about, but is in practice usually the most difficult for the ordinand to accept, is rigorous celibacy. The asceticism of Buddhists, however moderate, still involved total celibacy. That this was a problem in ancient times is evident from the need for the large number of rules in the Vinaya about sexuality, particularly those banning all abnormal forms. Sometimes, no doubt, recruits to the order were already married. An interesting episode from the Udāna offers a glimpse of the problems that could be faced by a would-be pravrajita. A monk is visited by his former wife, who seeks to persuade him that he must abandon his membership of the Order and return home to take up his family responsibilities; she shows him his baby son, seeking to appeal to his natural humanity.

Then, putting the child down in front of the venerable Sangāmaji, she went off, saying, 'There's your child, samaṇa. Support him!' Then the venerable Sangāmaji neither looked at that child nor said anything to him. Then Sangāmaji's former wife, before she had gone far, looked back and saw the venerable Sangāmaji neither looking at the child nor saying anything to him. On seeing that, she thought to herself: 'This samaṇa is not desirous even of his child.' Then, turning back, she took up the child and went off.

Now the Blessed One, with the divine eye, purified and transcending human vision, saw such impropriety on the part of Sangāmaji's former wife. At that time, seeing the meaning of it, he gave utterance to this udāna [solemn verse]: He does not rejoice at her coming, he is not sad when she goes. Sangāmaji is released (from all ties); him I call (a real) brāhmaṇa.¹³

A sutta story is not a historical record, but the purpose with which it is told may be historical evidence. The story of Sangāmaji was told as an example of steadfastness in the face of a strong inducement to lapse. It is a clue to the likelihood, prima facie strong, that followers of the Buddha might have to confront powerful opposition from their families.

We are entitled to wonder how often the radical rejection of any social role represented by 'going forth' provoked serious antagonism from the families of ordinands. The Pāli texts vouchsafe few hints of this. One passage refers explicitly to such complaints:

¹³ Udāna, ed. P. Steinthal (Routledge & Kegan Paul (for the PTS), London, 1982 (1885)), pp. 5–6.

People grumbled, took offence and became irritated, saying: 'The recluse Gotama has followed the path (paṭipanno) by causing childlessness, the recluse Gotama has followed the path by causing widowhood, the recluse Gotama has followed the path by splitting up families.'¹⁴

Bareau made a study of the reactions to having a family member become a Buddhist monk. Many of the cases recorded, unsurprisingly, tell of families enthusiastically supporting the Buddhist Order, but sometimes families are represented as expressing their indignation at the conversion of relatives. Bareau suggests two sources of this indignation: the social pride of high-caste families, and resentment at losing a son before he had time to produce an heir (thereby rendering family property liable to escheatment to the crown).¹⁵

WANDERING AND SOLITUDE

In Buddhist sources appear frequent statements of good reasons for preferring a peripatetic existence, operating alone or with only one or two companions. Teachers should seek seclusion; when their lay supporters crowd around them they may be corrupted.¹⁶ Life in a house is treated as a symbol for indulgence in the sensual pleasures, which seriously obstruct spiritual progress.¹⁷ The authority of other legendary Buddhas is called upon to justify the life of solitude. The Buddha Vipassin is said to have thought to himself: 'It is definitely not suitable for me that I should stay in the midst of a crowd. Better I should stay alone, distanced from the crowd.'¹⁸ The praise of solitude is a constant refrain. The Buddha's disciples were known to frequent the wilderness.¹⁹ The Buddha preferred wandering alone to the sort of gathering for the purpose of vain talk practised by other ascetics:

The Blessed One favours lodging in the remote wilderness among woods and forests, where there is scarcely a sound, scarcely a noise, pervaded by loneliness, utterly secluded and suitable for solitary meditation.²⁰

¹⁴ Vin I 43. This is the only place it occurs in the Canon.

¹⁵ A. Bareau, 'Les réactions des familles dont un membre devient moine selon le canon bouddhique pali', in O. H. de A. Wijesekera (ed.), Malalasekara Commemoration Volume (The Malalasekara Commemoration Volume Editorial Committee, Colombo, 1976), pp. 15–22.

¹⁶ M III 115ff. ¹⁷ Collins, Selfless Persons, pp. 167ff. ¹⁸ D II 30.

¹⁹ D III 195. ²⁰ D III 38.

We are told that the monk is likely to be found in the vicinity of a forest, trees, hillsides, glens, caves, charnel places or open fields.²¹ This is indeed a stock formula, found in many descriptions of the monk's favoured haunts: 'A monk favours lodging in some isolated spot – the wilderness, the root of a tree, a mountain cleft, a hill cave, a cemetery, a wild wood, an (unsheltered) place out in the open, a pile of straw.'²²

The Buddha's disciples were expected to make for remote haunts and stay in wild or forest areas.²³ The Buddha warned that monks who had not purified themselves or overcome their emotional fetters would only make things worse by dwelling in lonely dangerous places, but such a practice was right for those who had advanced in spirituality: 'I am one of those ariyas, purified in respect of behaviour, whose practice it is to lodge in the remote wilderness among woods and forests.'²⁴ When the Buddha discusses the factors of the prosperity of the Vajjians and lists the characteristics of the saṅgha, solitude occurs in this list.²⁵ The career of the Paccekabuddha involves ascetic renunciation and solitary wandering, conditions favouring prolonged meditation.²⁶ Mahāyāna later disparaged the image of the pratyekabuddha, but in the canonical Pāli texts the references appear in some of the oldest passages (for example in the Udāna and Sutta Nipāta, the Majjhima Nikāya, and the Niddesa) and unambiguously celebrate the values which the Paccekabuddha embodies. The whole character of Buddhist traditions about the careers of these enlightened beings displays the early values of the wandering forest ascetic. This has been argued in detail by Reginald Ray, whose study of the traditions about a whole series of such figures supports the ascetic paradigm for central Buddhist aspirations.²⁷ The peripatetic ideal is specially celebrated in the Sutta Nipāta, a text which has been seen as a probable locus for an early stage of Buddhist thought about a monk's life.²⁸ N. A. Jayawickrame has argued that the older parts of this text reflect a time before coenobitism flourished; the ²³ MI 360: a monk is expected to abandon property and live with a minimum of food and clothing, but the point of this sutta is to emphasize that what matters is his psychological attitude, not his outward circumstances. Cf. MII 8.

²¹ D III 49. ²² E.g., MI 274.

²⁴ MI 4 generally. The quotation is at MI 17.

²⁵ D II 77: 'so long as the brethren delight in forest dwellings (āraññakesu)'.

²⁶ M. Kloppenborg, The Paccekabuddha: a Buddhist Ascetic (E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1974), pp. 31–73. Cf. J. W. de Jong's review in IJ, 18 (1976), pp. 322–4.

²⁷ R. Ray, Buddhist Saints in India.

²⁸ Bronkhorst, The Two Traditions, p. 121. Vetter argues that the Aṭṭhakavagga contains the mystic teaching of a different monastic group that eventually came to merge with the Buddhist Order. T. Vetter, The Ideas and Meditative Practices of Early Buddhism (E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1988), appendix, pp. 101–5.

verse portions celebrating the peripatetic life of the muni, the bhikkhu or the samaṇa embody some of the oldest teachings, and the Khaggavisāṇa verses (praising the lonely wandering life of the rhinoceros) may survive from an original foundation upon which the collection of suttas was built.²⁹ Here we read that the Buddha takes the houseless state; housebound life causes defilement.³⁰ Solitude was the right condition for a monk.³¹ The monk was to cut himself off from all the constraints of life in society and wander forth untrammelled by family or property:

‘He who has sons takes pleasure in sons, and in the same way he who owns cows takes pleasure in his cows; for what supports a man gives him pleasure, and he who lacks support lacks pleasure.’ [These are the words of Māra. The Blessed One however says:] ‘He who has sons is made unhappy by sons, and in the same way he who owns cows is made unhappy by cows; for what supports a man makes him unhappy, and he who lacks support lacks unhappiness.’³²

Having torn one’s fetters asunder, like a fish breaking a net in the water, not returning, like a fire (not going back) to what is (already) burned, one should wander solitary as a rhinoceros horn.³³

The implication was clear: the monk was to find release in solitude:

Happy is isolation for one who is content, who has heard the dhamma, who has vision. Happy is the avoidance of harm, restraining oneself from (injury to) living creatures in the world. Happy is freedom from passion, passing beyond the world of desire.³⁴

Further, the many references to the Buddhist Order as the ‘Saṅgha of the Four Quarters’ clearly designates the ideal character of the saṅgha as an order of homeless peripatetics all belonging equally to all places. Such references occur in the Vinaya, in some post-canonical Pāli literature, and in various early inscriptions (generally later than the period considered here).³⁵ The term was examined by S. Dutt in his classic study of early Buddhist residence patterns; he emphasized the peripatetic ideal.³⁶ Sometimes the Saṅgha of the Four Quarters is the entire Buddhist Order, sometimes (as the tendency

²⁹ N. A. Jayawickrame, Analysis of the Sutta Nipāta. A critical analysis of the Pāli Sutta Nipāta illustrating its gradual growth (London, unpublished PhD thesis, 1947), pp. 9, 304ff.

³⁰ Sn 273, 1003, 207; cf. 805, 963.

³¹ Sn 45ff. One may wander in company with a wise and righteous companion, but in the absence of such a person, one must wander alone. Cf. Sn 208.

³² Sn 32f.

³³ Sn 61 Trans. in K. R. Norman, The Group of Discourses (Sutta-Nipāta) Volume II. Revised Translation (PTS, Oxford, 1992), p. 7.

³⁴ Udāna, ed. Steinthal, p. 10.

³⁵ On the Saṅgha of the Four Quarters, see Wijaratna, Le moine bouddhiste, p. 18.

³⁶ S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1984 (London, 1924)), pp. 90–5.

to form permanent monastic settlements set in) the expression designates particular local communities.

THE MONK AS GO-BETWEEN

But we must not go to extremes: to insist upon regarding the Buddha and his truest spiritual heirs as lonely hermits and nothing else would be to miss half the significance of the dhamma. The monks needed psychological detachment, just as a battery needs to be regularly recharged, and the best conditions for this lay in periods of solitude. But, in between, the whole point of the Buddha's way was to go from place to place, receiving offerings and imparting dhamma. Homelessness meant wandering (pra-vraj); wandering means going from place to place, not disappearing from human ken. We are not looking for hermits. In interpreting the earliest social form taken by Buddhism, the choice is not just between solitary hermits and community-involved coenobites. We should not describe the Buddha and his disciples purely as lonely mystics frequenting the wilds, and equally we should not describe them purely as cosmopolitans who attracted throngs and influenced the great and famous in the big cities. The point is that they were both, and indeed that they were commonly to be seen in the myriad villages where most people lived. This is fundamental to the sociology of Buddhism and the other śramaṇa movements; their leaders moved freely between two worlds, constantly moving from place to place.

The social role of the monk made him familiar with all conditions of men. He was to be found in the streets of a royal city, just as much as in a group of merchants hurrying along a forest track or among goatherds on upland pastures. Urbanization, in any society, pulls local elite groups into towns and cities; landlords gravitate to the city, at least seasonally,³⁷ and the best potential converts for the dhamma were likely to be found in the biggest settlements. In the fullest sense, then, the monk was a go-between.

All this goes some way to show that the role of the earliest transmitters of the dhamma was unlike that of the monk as a part of the settled rural order in modern Buddhist countries. It is not the case that, knowing what modern agrarian Buddhist societies are like, we can therefore recognize the dynamics of the society inhabited by the Buddha. The special conditions of early northeastern India during the urbanization process must have been different from those of later periods. In these conditions, Buddhism and the other non-brāhmaṇical teachings are likely to have found their niches in ways which cannot readily be inferred from the study of other places and times. In a modern setting, the community of monks participates in a stable social system. It facilitates the earning of merit by the lay population, with which it lives in symbiosis. Further, the order takes part in ceremonies, provides an avenue of advancement for the ambitious, keeps alive a tradition of higher values, and provides village education. Monks and nuns even participate in legal, social and economic exchanges in ways hardly countenanced by the letter of the monastic law. Indeed, inscriptions yield ample evidence of monastic involvement in various forms of social interaction in early times,³⁸ though they cannot tell us about the Buddha's own lifetime or the careers of the earliest converts.

³⁷ G. Sjöberg, 'The rise and fall of cities,' International Journal of Comparative Sociology, 4 (1963), pp. 110ff.

It would be wrong to suppose that the essential character of this social involvement of the saṅgha provides a premise from which we can reason backwards to the mechanisms by which Buddhism as such first acquired any sort of social role. Such a proceeding may tempt us to dismiss as marginal or incidental the whole tradition of solitary asceticism and meditation which the canonical texts clearly identify as the predominant concern of the dhamma. We should seek to understand the dhamma's origin by working from an understanding of the best evidence available. That evidence is furnished, for better or worse, by the texts. These represent the Buddhist monk as a wandering holy man, and it is this image to which we must give priority in the context of Buddhism's rise. In the next section we shall see that the image fits in its context very well.

COMMUNITY SELF-PERCEPTION IN AN AGE OF EXPANSION

On a map, or in a paragraph, the human settlements that made up an ancient Indian kingdom's population are anonymous and featureless, undifferentiated dots or notional quantities; we have little idea what it was like to live in them. But it was, ultimately, the feelings of their inhabitants that wrote the script – their loves and hates, their loyalties and distrusts – which determined how contests should end, what institutions should be supported or abandoned. What motives drove them? It is all too easy to manufacture interpretative categories out of ignorance, imagining for example that 'the masses' were one significant class of people, and 'the elite' another, or that the four ritual varṇas were such classes, each following its perceived interest in dealing with the others. But we cannot know how often, or whether, these categories really shaped history. There must have been many categories of interest and affinity, often cross-cutting, that defined significant classes; and we have to deduce, if we can, what they might have been.

³⁸ In a series of articles G. Schopen has demonstrated this social involvement from inscriptions, dating primarily from the early centuries of the Christian era. See for example 'Doing business for the Lord: lending on interest and written loan contracts in the Mūlasarvāstivādinaya', JAOS, 114 (1994), pp. 527–54; 'Monastic law meets the real world: a monk's continuing right to inherit family property in classical India,' HR, 35 (1996), pp. 101–23; 'Two problems in the history of Indian Buddhism: the layman/monk distinction and the doctrines of the transferences of merit', Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik, 10 (1985), pp. 9–47.

In modern society, significant groups of people which act on recognized shared interest tend to be horizontal – social classes or occupational groups. In ancient India the obvious working hypothesis must be different; it is much more likely that the significant groups were vertical – communities occupying particular areas. Features of the environment encouraging geographical separation, or facilitating one chieftain's control over an area, are more likely to have defined units of population with a natural coherence and cultural homogeneity.

Historical or social analysis favours simplicity of conceptualization and tends to interpret phenomena (such as religious movements) as products of continuing social or cultural patterns. But what if a phenomenon actually depends on social change, on transition? The period of the rise of Buddhism was one of expansion, as the rising urban-based kingdoms reached out to encroach upon hinterland communities. Paths first made by pioneers or refugees were increasingly trodden by traders, tax gatherers and war-bands or royal armies. With growing population, settlements grew and the patches of land they cleared grew and coalesced.

We have to recognize the major cultural adjustments that had to be made as the inhabitants of outlying settlements found their lives encroached upon by outsiders representing urban culture. Sometimes they could be recognized as fellow members of a cultural group, linked by lifestyle, language, religion, myth, ancestry, or any combination of these or other factors. Sometimes they could not. Either way, they might be seen as sources either of advantage or of danger.

When a state expanded into new territory, the people living there were under threat, but they might find opportunities too. They could suffer from armies, tax gatherers, press-gangs, and providers of goods and services in disastrous competition with local people. They could benefit from new trade opportunities, new resources, new employment possibilities, new wealth. All the time, they had to deal with an assertive and challenging set of cultural values and symbols coming from outside.

If these values and symbols belonged substantially to the set of shared culture and remembered history they already possessed, then brahmins, who were the custodians of acknowledged sacred truth, could mediate the fusion of separate groups, providing a language for the articulation of a common sense of community that integrated the locality within the larger unit. But what when shared cultural frameworks were absent or highly diffuse and there were no common cultural symbols? What when political dominance reached out quickly into the further hinterland where culturally unassimilated communities lived, strangers to brāhmaṇical rituals?

Not only would the extension of political hegemony have to be justified in other terms than a mere show of power, but different cultural positions would also have to be assimilated. Here, a different sort of cultural cement was required, neutral towards dominant culture and subordinated community alike. It is here that the figure of the holy man, a peripatetic symbol of power and wisdom, explicitly rejecting any stake in the institutions of power and authority, at home alike in the courts of kings and in the settlements of herdsmen or upland agriculturalists, had an important part to play.

This view of the social role of the Buddhist monk has the merit of relating the rise of Buddhism to the urbanization process in a more systematic way than do other accounts. The relationship lies in the role of the holy man, who, whatever his original personal motivation (and even in despite of it), could become an agent of acculturation, a middleman between the urban state and the remoter local cultures. But such a role was not part of the original ascetic and esoteric programme, as embodied in the earliest teachings; nor was it, in its evolution into a variety of social functions, envisaged by the villagers who first adopted a holy man as a repository of merit and protective energy. No doubt many monks, and very likely the Buddha himself, resisted the temptation to be drawn in, though at least the potentiality for this kind of role is implicit in some of the Buddha's activities.

At court, the monk could act as intercessor between a ruler and his potential targets or victims; but the traditional image of the Buddha as an adviser to kings makes clear the sensitivity of this role. It could so easily violate the other-worldly ideals of the ascetic path. Bareau has recognized this, emphasizing that the Buddha offered advice and teachings rather than attempting active mediation between two different cultures or world views.³⁹ In such situations, the Buddha encouraged kings to place their actions in a much broader spiritual context than that provided merely by the language of Realpolitik.

³⁹ Bareau, 'Le Bouddha et les rois', p. 38.

However, as a matter of social history, the passage between ascetic and public forms of Buddhism has always been too easy to make. Just as may be observed in modern Buddhist states, when we examine the process of domestication studied by anthropologists, even those monks who were wedded to the ideals of the ascetic wanderer must have found themselves drawn into the web of social interaction by a thousand subtle strands.

They depended for subsistence upon lay supporters; these perceived themselves to be benefiting from the monks in ways that need not have corresponded to the world view or values of the ascetic wanderers; in the course of daily contact the dissonant perceptions adjusted to each other and the monks were brought to play an integral part in the society which they had originally forsaken. The more truly ascetic and detached they were, the more attractive they might be to villagers as sources of spiritual benefit.

This process of domestication in the interaction between monks and laity was not a straightforward development whereby an earlier situation (villagers regard ascetic holy men as sources of spiritual energy and give them alms) came to be superseded by a later (monks reside close to villages and act as mentors, priests and teachers). It was, if modern parallels are any guide, a complex form of evolution, both rapid and gradual, with cycles contained within cycles. Overall, in the long run, the sangha settled in monasteries and became a social institution. In detail, in innumerable micro-historical narratives, holy men gained reputations, formed links with villagers, and became quasi-icons at the centre of church-like institutions, which after their death sometimes inspired other ascetic holy men. Different facets of Buddhism, seen differently by different people, co-existed at any given stage. Here, we wish to abstract, artificially, the earlier and later stages and see how monks could be holy men, or village priests, or both.

HOLY MEN AS MIDDLEMEN. THE ANALOGY OF THE CHRISTIAN HOLY MAN

An interpretation of the monk as holy man mediating between diverse social groups finds support from the analogy of better documented historical episodes, where holy men have acquired a political role in the interaction between a cosmopolitan state and a culturally diverse local society. Conspicuous is the case of the Christian peripatetics of the Levant in late antiquity, as studied by Peter Brown.⁴⁰ Brown points to the need of hermits to separate themselves from society and frequent the wilderness. However, they also often visited public places wherever there were congregations of merchants, soldiers or migrant groups. The society that honoured them was not poverty-stricken, for there were big prosperous villages in Syria: 'The holy man did not arise from any misère of the country-folk, as is too often stated.'⁴¹ Here as in India, we find no evidence for the assumption that social distress was a precondition of success for a message of salvation. Rather, with few exceptions, both economy and society appear on the evidence to have been expanding, and societies came into possession of more sophisticated technologies and broader cultural horizons.

The Syrian parallel is instructive. Holy men, once they had gained respect, could function as village patrons (replacing landlords, who were migrating to the towns); they could offer advice, use their influence as men of birth and education in matters of law and taxation; they could heal and exercise; they could arbitrate in local disputes.

In 1995, Brown modified his earlier emphasis upon the political role of the holy man as a mentor of rulers, preferring to stress his mediating activity in the hinterland, in 'marginal' areas. The holy man 'in many regions, acted as a facilitator in the transition from paganism to Christianity';⁴² examples show how the holy man could adapt to local perceptions of the sacred, and often directly confronted the local sorcerer, acting as healer or intercessor with divine power.⁴³

These men had to separate themselves rigorously from society if they were to be trusted as neutral, disinterested helpers, spiritual or social. By his asceticism, even his eccentricity, a holy man marked himself off as a quintessential outsider wherever he went, standing 'outside the ties of family, and of economic interest . . . he was thought of as the man who owed nothing to society . . . whose attitude to food itself rejected all the ties of solidarity to kin and village that . . . had always been expressed by the gesture of eating'.⁴⁴ The more rigorous the asceticism, the greater the assurance of a holy power that transcended local horizons; Saint Simeon Stylites, perched atop his pole, was the holy man par excellence. He, like the Buddha, was credited with a 'lion's roar'.⁴⁵

⁴⁰ P. Brown, 'The rise and function of the holy man in late antiquity', in Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity (Faber and Faber, London, 1982), pp. 103–52; P. Brown, Authority and the Sacred. Aspects of the Christianisation of the Roman World (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995).

⁴¹ Brown, 'Rise and Function', p. 115. ⁴² Brown, Authority and the Sacred, p. 64.

⁴³ Ibid., pp. 57–8, passim. ⁴⁴ Brown, 'Rise and Function', p. 131.

⁴⁵ 'Delegations from neighbouring villages, headed by their priests and elders . . . trooped up the side of the mountain to hear "the lion roar" as to how they should order their affairs,' ibid., p. 128.

Brown sees the holy man as a mediator between cosmopolitan and parochial cultures where society is fluid and social mobility is accelerating, where ancient institutional centres of religious certainty are losing relevance, where education is spreading, where the authority of the powerful individual is replacing that of the patriarch and where sanctity is coming to reside in people rather than places. He could have been describing northeastern India in the period of urbanization.⁴⁶

THE HOLY MAN IN INDIA

India was already, in the fourth century BCE, highly diverse socially and linguistically; all the more timely, then, was the emergence of a group of figures who could aptly play the part of middlemen or facilitators. Their position did not depend in the least upon social distress, disease or increasing inequality among the ordinary folk; it arose from the stresses generated as the cultures of expanding states failed to fit within the world view of ordinary folk. A universal redefinition was needed in order to provide justification for the many changes that had taken place, producing a degree of culture shock not experienced before. Buddhism represented one such redefinition.

Another can be found in both Sanskrit epics, though the visions they offer are somewhat different, the Mahābhārata offering a much more fractured view of the changes, and the possible response to them. The brahmins had an ideology based on varṇa and ritual status that probably already existed by the time the Brāhmaṇas were composed, beginning in approximately 800 BCE, but this was tied into a particular language that was rapidly becoming archaic and increasingly different from any vernacular, and was quite socially exclusivist to begin with.

Buddhism (like some other ascetic schools) did not appear exclusive or particularistic, and could appeal where brahmins were seen as alien. This was where the wandering ascetic, intent upon salvation, could meet a need. His appeal was not to the gods of specific communities, but to impersonal principles that could be understood anywhere. Instead of taxes, he asked for left-overs. Instead of war-bands, he controlled untamed spiritual forces that lived in the wilderness. He could be regarded with favour, however cautiously, by kings as well as peasants. In an expanding state, it was natural for a ruler to seek association with such figures, even at the cost of disapproval from the priestly custodians of his own ancestral religious culture. This is because, if the state is to cohere, it must acquire a set of legitimizing principles in which all its constituent communities can recognize themselves. So long as the majority of the population under the lordship of a ruler consisted of people who recognized a single culture or ethnicity,⁴⁷ it was natural for the ruler to ground his legitimacy in this shared culture; when the majority of the population consisted of groups with quite different traditions, it was natural for the ruler to seek legitimacy in a new and universal ideology. It is therefore not surprising that a ruler such as Aśoka should have expressed disapproval of trivial ceremonies and patronized lavishly the communities of śramaṇas.⁴⁸

⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 148. Friedrich-Silber, Virtuosity, Charisma, and Social Order, pp. 45ff. discusses Brown's analysis, emphasizing its social-functional approach. Such an approach, though, can be usefully married to a concern with the transcendent and ideological dimension of the monk's role, as the present study will show.

The point is fundamental; śramaṇa teachers were not just rustic medicine men from the wilderness. They were active everywhere. They could therefore be co-opted to stand for the solidarity of the kingdom, a solidarity that was cemented by a new message that insisted upon the universality of values, and subverted the privileged authority of Vedic rituals and myths which were controlled by a special group. This sort of message was just what rulers needed when they were trying to bring beneath their dominion communities too diverse in culture and origins to be accommodated within a ready-made Sanskrit-brāhmanical image.

This whole situation was essentially transitional, but could last quite a long time. Generations of cultural interaction had to intervene before the brahmins could do their work, and cultural integration could occur. One could also add that the separation of monks from the king not only allowed an element of perceived independence to the monk, but released the king from dependence upon the brahmins, on whom he would have had to rely for major public ritual and legal interpretation. The Hindu king was circumscribed by the brahmins' role as the custodians of tradition, but this would never apply to a king's dealings with a Buddhist monk, who made no claim to superiority in a hierarchy.

⁴⁷ Ethnicity is a slippery concept which has changed its meaning in scholarly usage. Culture or even subjective world view has been replacing anything like biological ancestry as a main criterion. See for example Sian Jones, 'Discourses of identity in the interpretation of the past', in P. Graves-Brown, S. Jones and C. Gamble (eds), Cultural Identity and Archeology: the Construction of European Communities (Routledge, London and New York, 1996), pp. 62–80; Sian Jones, The Archeology of Ethnicity: Constructing Identities in the Past and Present (Routledge, London and New York, 1997), esp. p. 128.

⁴⁸ 'Women especially perform a variety of ceremonies, which are trivial and useless': Major Rock Edict IX; see R. Thapar, Aśoka and the Decline of the Mauryas (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1961), pp. 253ff.

THE FIT BETWEEN BUDDHISM AND INDIAN HISTORY

The critical factors in the rise of holy men to importance operate in specific temporary conditions – rapid encroachment by a state upon diverse outlying communities. If the encroachment continues the conditions will change, and eventually, as cultures mingle through patronage and intermarriage, a single core tradition will emerge, and the brahmins – or monks who have come to behave like brahmins – will win. On this hypothesis, Buddhism and the other śramaṇa traditions were likely to prosper wherever and whenever a metropolitan culture expanded among alien populations speaking different languages and recognizing no shared ancestry; brahmanism was likely to prosper where expansion was among communities already sharing a cultural past. The difference between the two situations is one of degree, and in practice priestly and śramaṇa religious figures could compete for influence.

This interpretation is supported by the subsequent course of Buddhist history. The hypothesis would predict that, so long as it retained its original śramaṇa character, Buddhism would be particularly influential in the outer zones of expanding Sanskrit civilization, where the discontinuity between the old Aryan-Vedic culture and indigenous populations remained stark, and at the courts of imperial rulers. The success of Buddhism in the frontier zones of the northeast, the northwest and the south takes its place in this interpretation.

The hypothesis would also predict that, as Sanskrit civilization spread and consolidated, and different populations were gradually brought together by intermarriage and cultural osmosis, the role of mediator between metropolitan expansion and Little Tradition would fall increasingly to ritual priestly figures (in a word, brahmins) rather than ascetics, and Buddhism would retreat to the furthest social frontiers and beyond.

All religions change a great deal in the course of history; most of them turn into their opposites in some environments. Buddhism could lose much of its śramaṇa character in a new environment (though the scriptures were always available to inspire local revivals of it) and take on the particularistic features of a regional orthodoxy, its monks functioning like priests within local social structures; indeed, this tendency to institutionalization would have been present from the first, as an element in the interaction between different perceptions of the monks. This way of interpreting the history of Buddhism in India as a response to socio-cultural conditions is essentially new, although a few of its elements appear severally in the observations of some scholars – for example S. Dutt,⁴⁹ D. D. Kosambi,⁵⁰ M. M. Marasinghe,⁵¹ Romila Thapar,⁵² and Michael Carrithers.⁵³ Substantial empirical support for it may be found in the fit between what it predicts and the course of Indian Buddhist history, as sketched above. Spelling out this fit in detail would require another monograph, but familiar facts about the historical geography of Buddhism represent prima facie a persuasive case.

MODERN PARALLELS

It is dangerous to rely uncritically upon parallels from vastly different historical contexts; but, if there is any value at all in the proposal that holy men could prosper because there was a need for them as intermediaries between incommensurable cultural orders, the proposal abstracts something basic that is likely to be common to different societies. The much more accessible evidence of holy men linking polis with little tradition in modern times is worth noticing here, not as proof of anything, but because it can usefully illustrate the sorts of things that holy men in ancient India might have done.

The forest tradition in Thailand offers examples of monks whose fame as ascetics has involved them in the processes of politicization whereby isolated localities have been subjected to the influences of expanding national culture. Some have resisted the pressures to be drawn in – notably Acharn Man in the northeast, who early in the twentieth century inspired a strong and continuing movement.⁵⁴

Such a movement genuinely offers a parallel to the religion of the frontier regions of expanding Sanskritic civilization in ancient India. The northeast of Thailand was relatively isolated until the nineteenth century; according to Sunait Chutintaranond, only in the late nineteenth century did anything like a centralized state begin to appear under the energetic policies of King Chulalongkorn.⁵⁵ The north-easterners were still adjusting to the crisis of cultural redefinition in Acharn Man's time.

⁴⁹ Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, pp. 153–6. ⁵⁰ Kosambi, 'Early stages', pp. 45ff.

⁵¹ M. M. Marasinghe, Gods in Early Buddhism: a study in their social and mythological milieu as depicted in the Nikāyas of the Pali Canon (University of Sri Lanka Press, Vidyānkara, 1974), p. 28, and citing G. P. Malalasekara, Dictionary of Pāli Proper Names (published for the PTS by Luzac, London, 1960), vol. 1, p. 295 (Ālavī), vol. II, p. 1210, M III 268, S IV 61 (Sunāparanta), and D 2 166f. (Moriyas).

⁵² Thapar, From Lineage to State, pp. 149ff. ⁵³ Carrithers, Buddha, pp. 86, 90ff.

⁵⁴ See J. L. Taylor, Forest Monks and the Nation-State (Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, Singapore, 1993), for a study of this movement.

⁵⁵ Sunait Chutintaranond, 'Mandala', "Segmentary State" and the politics of centralization in medieval Ayudhya', Journal of the Siam Society, 78 (1990), pp. 89–100.

The pressures upon well-known monks to become part of the state apparatus have been real enough, with famous teachers sometimes attracting attention from the Thai monarchy and being made national icons.⁵⁶ One forest monk, Thui, was an effective mediator: 'Thui's linkage with influential élite helped to facilitate dialogue with local bureaucrats, and resultant attention on matters such as road repairs, bridge maintenance, or general village concerns.'⁵⁷ Important national figures liked to visit such famous monks, and wealthy supporters provided resources which could be used for the benefit of villages living in symbiosis with monasteries belonging to Man's tradition. Another monk, Baen, promoted the building of a road to a local village, using contacts in the government organization for rural development; he helped to establish a rice bank and a credit union, and 'arranged the distribution of used clothing and medicines to the isolated hived communities further into the Phuuphaan heartland'. Another monk, Wan Uttamo, promoted small-scale irrigation projects, with the King's benevolent interest. Such people combined their roles as meditation masters with the status of 'development monk' (Phra Nakpathanaa).⁵⁸

Such monks acquire charisma which offers to lay supporters the means of making merit; they offer their donations to a famed monk, whether for public works or for the support of his monastic organization. As Acharn Tate recorded: 'Funds for [community projects] never seem to have dried up, and there remains a strong interest in aiding my projects . . . I have never gone out looking for even a penny, but funds have rolled in from all directions.'⁵⁹

J. L. Taylor's important work on the forest monks of northeastern Thailand, cited above, shows how the tension between ascetic, public and popular images of the Buddhist monk is worked out. What has been happening repeatedly in the career of Acharn Man and the more renowned of his disciples is likely to have happened countless times since the lifetime of the Buddha. As Taylor summarizes it, the cycle typically begins with ⁵⁶ Taylor, Forest Monks, pp. 214ff. Extensive government regulation of the training and organization of monks has even extended to the issue of identification cards for monks: ibid., p. 98.

⁵⁷ Ibid., p. 242.

⁵⁸ The Thai experience shows how readily Buddhist monks can slide into social roles as facilitators, mediators, counsellors and so forth. As Friedrich-Silber details, the modern Thai government is actively concerned to use monks as 'local agents in the implementation of its modernization policies', and the Thai Buddhist monastery has multiple social roles as 'a community center, counselling agency, hospital, school, community chest, free hotel, news agency, charity employer, bank (at low or no interest), clock, sports center, morgue, poorhouse, landlord . . .' See Friedrich-Silber, Virtuosity, Charisma and Social Order, p. 91, n. 38.

⁵⁹ Ajahn Tate, The Autobiography of a Forest Monk (Wat Hin Mark Peng, Chiang Mai, Thailand, 1993), pp. 264ff.

a wandering monk, following an ascetic lifestyle,⁶⁰ favouring a particular spot for his rainy-season retreat and gaining a reputation for sanctity among local villagers; subsequently, other ascetic monks come, and buildings are put up; the site, with its shifting population, attracts patronage from further afield; the administrative apparatus of the state-sponsored saṅgha begins to absorb the monastery, and scholarly (not ascetic) monks are installed in it (that is, pariyat replaces patibat);⁶¹ the monastery becomes a node in the national religious network. After the death of the original ascetic teacher who inspired the process, the settlement becomes a monument; devotees make pilgrimages to it in order to benefit from its concentrated spiritual energy, and great men endow it so that pariyat monks can study there, but the real ascetics forsake it and seek solitude elsewhere.⁶²

This shows how forest monks continue an ancient tradition of asceticism. It also shows the tension between the image of the ascetic monk as a repository of talismanic spiritual power, and that of the institutionalized monk engaging in study and education; the tension produces various forms of Buddhism within a generation or so. But the superimposition of these images upon our map of ancient India, where so much space is blank, can only provide broad-brush strokes on the canvas. It depends in large part upon our acceptance of an interpretation that views the monk as a mediator between ill-assorted cultural groups being brought together willy-nilly.

THE DOMESTICATED MONK AS MIDDLEMAN

It must at least be clear, though, that the wandering holy man and the domesticated monk do not belong to two different institutions, stages of history, or cultural worlds. They interpenetrate; they can be one and the same man, seen from different points of view. This being understood, we may attempt some insight into the ways in which Buddhist monks, as their careers came to be shaped by the concerns of their lay supporters, became domesticated.

Buddhism grew to be a world religion because it succeeded so well in attracting lay supporters, especially those who were prepared to be munificent.

⁶⁰ A monk following the forest tradition in its austere form; thudong kammathan. These monks often observe the dhutāṅgas (see above, p. 163). Cf. Taylor, Forest Monks, pp. 326–8.

⁶¹ In Pāli scriptures occur the terms pariyatti, 'learning (the doctrine)', and patipatti, 'practising (the doctrine)' as two of the three stages of progress of the disciple (the third being realization of the goal of the doctrine); Nyanatiloka (ed.), Buddhist Dictionary: manual of Buddhist terms and doctrines (3rd edn, Frewin, Colombo, 1972), s.v. pariyatti.

⁶² This conflates summaries of the process by Taylor, Forest Monks, pp. 96ff., 202.

Without this success it could not have undergone the massive expansion it experienced after the reign of Aśoka, or left monumental evidence of its presence right across Asia.⁶³

However, the study of the relationship between the laity and the Buddhist saṅgha, depicted in the earliest texts of Buddhism, is fraught with difficulty. True, there is much material, especially in the Vinaya and the Nikāyas, detailing interaction between laity and monks and nuns. Much of the description, though, is highly formulaic, and though this very fact is important in its own right, it does not allow us to tease out the details of daily interaction between monks and laity.

There are descriptions of a wide range of meals and alms-gathering activities; beyond this, the specific mechanisms of interaction are reduced to stereotypes and formulae. Material dealing with lay–monk interaction that is not structured round the meal relates mostly to the laity censuring monkish behaviour, so that the Buddha is required to declare a rule of conduct. Ostensibly the justification for many of the rules stemmed from the pressure of a censorious laity that required from the monks a strict adherence to a particular modest lifestyle. Whether this reflects the reality of lay pressure is very difficult to tell; we have no other evidence of such involvement beyond the texts, unless, on the basis of inscriptions which attest their active material support, we infer the lay supporters to have functioned somewhat like a modern-day pressure group. Rather, in the Vinaya passages the laity seems to represent an absolutely predictable body of opinion that could be drawn upon always by the Buddha or other senior monks as unwavering justification for the imposition on monks of particular standards.

At all events, the very fact that Vinaya rules were handed down in a framework of narratives explaining why such rules had to be proclaimed helps us understand the range of options within which early Buddhism could develop its images of monks and nuns, or, on the other hand, of the laity. It is especially important if we are to understand fully the role of the monk as social mediator. If the monk truly did derive status from mediating between different social classes, between different political and administrative groups and, above all, between outlying community and principal city, then it should be conceded, theoretically at least, that this mediatory function would have related the order of monks to lay non-Buddhists as well as committed Buddhists.

⁶³ See Jeffrey Samuels, 'Views of householders and lay disciples in the Sutta Piṭaka: a reconsideration of the lay/monastic opposition', Religion, 29 (1999), pp. 231–41.

One approach, which will be developed in further detail in the next chapter, is to speculate on the basis of the immense amount of material about the laity and the monk or nun in the Vinaya. This deliberate attention to the Vinaya is appropriate, since this corpus appears to have been shaped in a period later than that of the wandering mendicants. By then, monastic life was normal and the monks had a regular part to play, well understood on both sides, in interaction with villagers. Sensitivity about lay-monk relations is one of the fundamental parameters of the Vinaya.

In part this is because the Order was dependent on material support (financial support, once money came into use) for its survival. But it is also because the monk and the layperson were contrasted with each other as role models. The image of the monk is carefully circumscribed in the 318 rules of the Vinaya and tested continually in the many narratives accompanying the proclamation of the individual rules where monks and nuns are declared as coming into too close contact with laymen,⁶⁴ either in mimicking their activity, or mixing too often with them. As a symbol of immersion in a world dominated by the senses⁶⁵ the layman is portrayed as the opposite of what the monk should be. Of course, the image of the layman is much more nuanced than this in the texts and various degrees of attachment to sense objects are recognized. In short, the layman is both the opposite of what the monk should be and a control over the monk's behaviour.

The social role of the monk can be glimpsed by examining more closely contrasting paradigms – the monk enshrines what the layman could be, and the layman what the monk should not be – and different forms of authority (held by the laity by virtue of its possession of the wealth needed to support the Order, and the monk in having access to the conditions needed for nibbāna). Moreover, we must show that the role of monk as mediator was widespread, that it was not enshrined in the Buddha alone, even if he is always the ideal role model for the monk. We must recognize that as the originally unattached wandering monks became domesticated, settling in monasteries and serving the community, the tension between the original mission and the current social role became greater and greater.

⁶⁴ See Vin II 7: 'At that time the venerable Seyyasaka was foolish and ignorant, had committed many offences against the Vinaya, did not take advice, lived in too close association with householders in ways that were inappropriate. So much so that the monks were fed up with granting him probation, sending him back to the beginning, imposing mānatta, rehabilitating him.'

⁶⁵ As in the formulaic expression Vin II 105-6: 'People grumbled, took offence and became irritated, saying: "(the six monks) are just like householders, enjoying sensual pleasure," referring to the group of six monks using a bathing board; Vin II 106ff. refers to the six monks wearing bracelets, chains, etc., using a mirror, smearing their faces with ointment, wearing woollen clothes. The same expression occurs many times elsewhere in the Cullavagga.

The monk was a renouncer practising a mild asceticism, who could not ostensibly belong to any of the social networks⁶⁶ he might have served. He was an outsider, even in the midst of society. Thus the monk, because of his training in a doctrine having universal ramifications, could be seen as living at the edge of – yet necessarily beyond – two or more worlds. In assuming the role of social mediator, however it might be defined, was the monk denying the basic spirit, if not letter, of the eight-limbed path? Any theory of the monk as mediator must explain how this role would fit with the view of the monk constructed within the framework of Vinaya rules; we can see how such rules served to maintain something of the original spirit. They were specifically designed to prevent any kinds of attachments forming, and to uphold – by the power of enforceable discipline if necessary – the ulterior spiritual goal of the monk.

A closer examination of the monks' mediatory role after domestication had set in follows in chapter 10. Before we turn to this, one more important question deserves to be identified, although the present study does not answer it; but it needs to be recognized as an important area of enquiry linking the study of the monk's role to the study of the wider social environment. The question is how exactly, once settlement in monasteries has become normal for the Order, the monk who acts as mediator fits into his environment. If there were only a few monks in a district, they might well have no monastery. Would they live in the communities on which they depended for alms? How long, and in what places, did the monks maintain the genuinely homeless condition? And what were the necessary conditions in which monasteries were likely to be provided on the outskirts of particular settlements?

Particularly important here is the evidence of archaeology, which shows the association between Buddhist settlements and the network of economic and political activities that developed with the growth of kingdoms and empires. J. Heitzman notes that at the time of Aśoka Buddhist sites were 'closely linked to the major forms of political and economic organization that were developing at the same time', arguing that Buddhist communities played a part in the imperial state, 'serving as symbolic structures mediating social hierarchy within a new urban complex', and points to the continuing close association between Buddhist sites and trade routes or centres in later centuries.⁶⁷ We have already noticed that the geography of ⁶⁶ See Greg Bailey, Materials for the Study of Ancient Indian Ideologies: Pravṛtti and Nivṛtti (Pubblicazioni di Indologica Taurinensia, Turin, 1985), pp. 88–94, drawing on the Sutta Nipāta.

⁶⁷ J. Heitzman, 'Early Buddhism', pp. 121–37. Similar is H. P. Ray, The Winds of Change: Buddhism and the maritime links of early South Asia (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1994), pp. 136–43.

Buddhism's subsequent history can provide indirect confirmation of the interpretation advanced here – it thrived where changing political and economic conditions brought together discrepant cultural groups. We now see also how important to Buddhist history is its micro-geography, so to speak – the study of residence patterns in relation to the monks' go-between status.

*Preparation of the monk for the mediatory role.
Evidence from the Sutta Nipāta*

Whilst the mediatory role of the monk is implied in many texts throughout the Canon and, in some very specific ways, is treated explicitly in the Vinaya, certain texts like the Dhammapada and the Sutta Nipāta allow us to construct a normative picture of the implications of this role better than the great majority of other texts in the Canon. Not that either text is built around this theme. They are not, but they do have special relevance for an understanding of the role. A case can be made that, like the Dhammapada, the *Sutta Nipāta*¹ offers a normative image of the monk and ties into this image the preliminary conditions – detachment and impartiality – essential for the monk who would be a mediator. This is not to say the normative monk described in this text would have performed this role, but it definitely creates the possibility that it could be so. If there is a problem here it is that the image given of the monk is surely of a hypothetical figure and stands in sharp contrast with the much more realistic image given in the Vinaya and the Dīgha and Majjhima Nikāyas.

The Sn is a text full of didactic verses replete with verbs in the optative, giving the text the strong impression of being injunctive in its intent, an impression strengthened by the constant use of privative nouns and particles of negation in many verses. Add to this the frequently appearing conversion frame which gives the Buddha a chance to preach some of his basic teachings, and a text is produced having direct relevance as a statement of both doctrine and ethical behaviour, which cannot be separated from each other. In the conversion stories the Buddha does not appear to play the mediatory role in the manner we describe it in this section of the book, but these narratives can be read as implying it. They depict the Buddha interacting with, and impressing, individuals of different classes, both human and non-human.² By extension the monk should have presented himself in a similar manner. Here the words 'presented himself' are pivotal, because it is how the monk appears to others – and meets the expectations of laypeople and those who were wary of holy men – that must have been the crucial factor for his success in mediating between the different cultural forces becoming ever more visible in the society of the time. The Sn is valuable in giving us, in a number of highly concentrated and repetitive passages, a sketch of what the expected behaviour of the monk should be, behaviour deriving from a stringently cultivated psychological attitude.

¹ We have used the Sutta-nipāta, ed. D. Andersen and H. Smith (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1984 (1913)) and follow the translation of K. R. Norman, The Group of Discourses. Because of the excessive literalism of this translation we have modified some of his renderings.

The Sn has been recognized³ as an early text in the Canon, though its different parts have been stratified in accord with differing times of composition. A recent book by R. Ray argues, in deference to this temporal stratification, that the image of the Buddha depicted here is centred on the 'forest-dwelling' monk, that it conveys the possibility of a Buddhism whose spatial location is the forest, not the urban areas so prominently featured elsewhere in the Canon. Ray argues:

The depiction of the Buddha in the Suttanipāta thus closely parallels, indeed exceeds, that of the Buddhacarita in its emphasis on the forest life and its values. This parallelism between the Suttanipāta and the Buddhacarita is important because it suggests that the understanding of the Buddha as an essentially forest personage goes back to an early time in Buddhism and that the 'urban Buddha' is not necessarily the earliest one.⁴

This assumes a very early date for the Sn, but it seems unnecessarily restrictive to distinguish between an 'urban' and a 'forest' Buddha. A shift in spatial emphasis may have occurred in the first few centuries of Buddhism, but our point here is that the whole ambit of the psychological approach of Buddhist teaching was that the monk would be at home in either the isolation of the forest or the bustle of the city. If this was not the case the monk could not have been a mediator in the sense we are arguing for this role here. Indeed, the whole thrust of the Sn is that the monk/sage should have cut ties with sufficient facility and absoluteness not to be affected by any influences from human contact that would plunge him back into the samsāra from which he was seeking release.

² There is always an asymmetrical relationship operating here. The Buddha is consistently superior spiritually, though not socially, as several brahmins are amongst those converted.

³ K. R. Norman, Pāli Literature, Including the Canonical Literature in Prakrit and Sanskrit of All the Hīnayāna Schools of Buddhism (Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, 1983), pp. 63–70 and for relative dating of the particular parts see The Group of Discourses, pp. xxvii–xxix. See also R. Ray, Buddhist Saints in India, p. 74, n. 40; O von Hinüber, A Handbook of Pāli Literature (Walter de Gruyter, Berlin and New York, 1996), pp. 48–9; T. Vetter, 'Some remarks on older parts of the Suttanipāta,' in D. Seyfort-Ruegg and L. Schmithausen (eds), pp. 36–56.

⁴ R. Ray, Buddhist Saints in India, p. 64.

Our response to this is that the Sn knows of the spatial opposition between the gāma, and the nigāma (995) and the arañña and also political concepts like the raṭṭha (287) and janapada (287, 683, 995, 1102). Although Ray is right to focus on its forest-like ambience, we argue that the main image presented in this text is that of the monk as wanderer.⁵ The need for the monk to inhabit, if temporarily, the village in order to receive alms is certainly present (180, 710–11) throughout the text, and if the forest might be a place where the monk can perfect his psychological and social detachment, he is never constrained to remain there. From another perspective the injunction to wander is consistent with the mediatory role because the mobility it implies would be essential if the monk is to be able to communicate the views of the city and the expanding political bodies to those who had only ever lived in a village environment. The monk had to have knowledge of both areas.

CULTIVATION OF DETACHMENT

The disinterested attitude of the monk is the essential precondition of his role as mediator, an attitude constantly portrayed in the texts as detachment, a condition achieved only by the complete severing of all ties. Overwhelmingly in the Sn, statements about the holy man (the words bhikkhu, muni and brāhmaṇa seem to be used indiscriminately in the Sn) are given which exemplify the attitude of detachment and the required behaviour going with it. Verse 220 is instructive in its contrast of the householder with the sage, the two being treated as natural opposites.

The two of them, having quite different dwelling place and way of life, are not the same. The householder supports a wife and the sage is unselfish and of good vows. The householder is not fully restrained in respect of the killing of other living creatures; the sage, being restrained, constantly protects living creatures.

Whilst the intent of the Sn is to prescribe ethical behaviour for both the householder and the monk from a Buddhist point of view, its unequivocal view is that there can be no accommodation between the two lifestyles (vuttino). The differences between the two are not just differences of degree.

⁵ Even leaving aside those instances where derivatives of car can be translated as 'action, behaviour', there are multitudes of examples (25, 32–75, prose p. 21, 180, 208, 213, 218, 250, 328, 342, 344, etc.) of the monk being enjoined to wander, usually alone, and always the verb car is used, normally in the optative.

They are meant to be virtually absolute (see especially 214), though not inseparable. In spite of the sense of isolation in which the Sn seems to place the monk, it is always accepted the monk will approach the householder for material support. The layperson, irrespective of his class, will approach the monk for spiritual learning, as the Sn elaborates in its conversion narratives.

Yet an important sub-text of the Sn, and one crucial for defining the image of the monk, is the possibility of the monk's becoming entangled in the views of other sects, on the one hand, and in the disputes between factions in villages, on the other. That is why the wandering monk should be 'independent (anissito), not to be led by others . . .' (364),⁶ a view given some context in 371: 'The learned believer, seeing the way (to salvation), not following any faction among the factious (vaggagatesu na vaggasāri).'⁷ All the verses in this, the Sammāparibbājanīyasutta, describe the wandering monk as utterly impartial, one in whom all attachments to the world are completely broken. The refrain of sixteen of the seventeen verses reads sammā so loke paribbajeyya, 'he should wander properly in the world', where the resonance of renunciation is present in the verb paribhaj. Here the text joins the wandering theme with those of independence and detachment, which we are arguing constitute the minimum conditions for the mediatory role to be effective for those amongst whom it is exercised. A monk should be seen to be independent and detached as well as truly embodying both these characteristics in every aspect of his private and public life.

A fuller statement of the required attitude of a sage is given in verses 702–23, verses which repeat much of what occur in earlier verses in the Sn, but place the ascetic's behaviour in a more social context. Asita has asked the Buddha to explain the state of sagehood (moneyyan, 702). The resulting explanation turns on the sage's neutrality and implies how this might be utilized in the village context.

One should practise equanimity (samānabhāvaṃ), for praise and abuse occur in a village. One should ward off faults in the mind. One should wander calmed, without pride. (702)

The point here is that the monk represents a constant amongst the changeable features of everyday life, summarized in this verse as the duality of praise and abuse. The duality implied here could be a result of the factionalizing suggested in other verses, yet is, no doubt, a normal part of village life. It is more speculative whether this is a reference to the way individual ascetics may have been treated. Praise and/or abuse were no doubt expressed in respect of many monks by the large non-ascetic population with whom they come into contact. This could also correlate with calmness and absence of pride, the latter suggesting deliberately displayed satisfaction in the accomplishment of the ascetic role. Neither praise nor abuse is desirable, but both could be consequences of arrogant behaviour. Alone, equanimity (sāmānabhāva) – lit. ‘even or unchanging nature’ – is to be cultivated. Both calmness and absence of pride would seem go with samāna in a behavioural sense.

⁶ The same word occurs in a similar context in 66, 363, 756, 815, 853, 860, 951 and 1073.

⁷ See also 800 and 912 for the compound vaggasāri.

One of the reasons for this is given in the next verse:

Various sorts of things emerge, like the flames of a fire in a forest. Women will seduce a sage, do not let them seduce you. (703)

Surely this verse must be understood as recommending an attitude of constant vigilance against provocation of any kind, sex and heat being brought together because of their common characteristic of provoking inflammatory reactions. The sage may have been regarded as a sexual object, since he was supposedly untouchable, and the Vinaya rules are much taken up with the lapse of monks back into sexual misdemeanours. It is likely this recommendation referred to actual possibilities, as much as to a general statement that equanimity could not exist within the presence of sexual desire. Verse 704 reiterates the use of sexual intercourse as a symbol of all other desires which must be renounced if the monk is to be neither opposed (aviruddho) to nor attached (asāratto) to living things. It is not enough to be detached, he must also harbour no negative emotions towards living things.

The next verse takes a different tack and recommends strongly against the performance of violent acts.

‘As I am, so are these; as are these, so am I.’ With this idea and comparing himself with others, he should not kill or cause to kill. (705)

If this suggests a similarity with all other humans, the following verse adds a further qualification which immediately belies this.

Having abandoned desire and lust, to which the ordinary individual is attached, one with vision should set out (on the path). He should cross over this hell. (706)

Here hell (naraka) is surely a synonym of samsāra and ‘cross over’ the technical term so often used to indicate the passing over samsāra. It is as though the previous verse has laid down the conditions of the monk’s humanity as being identical with the normal person and the present verse indicates the initial attitudes to be cultivated if the monk’s path is to be followed in any realistic way. The monk could not be a mediator if the conditions of the first two pādas of verse 705 applied to his habitual thoughts and activities. Of course, there must be some recognition of similarity if he is to have awareness of human problems experienced by those still trapped within saṃsāra, yet verse 706 makes it clear that rejection of desire must begin the process of differentiation of the monk. Moreover, the preconditions for the success of the mediatory role would be absent if he was still in thrall to desire and lust.

The next seven verses are concerned with the appropriate way in which a monk should beg for food. However, they offer guidance in all aspects of a monk's life and highlight his uniqueness by virtue of his removal from the concerns of everyday life. His need to demonstrate a deliberate distance is especially stressed in the two following verses.

When he has been on his alms-round, he should take himself to a grove. Standing at the foot of a tree, (or) come to a seat, he is a sage. (708)

Intent on meditation, he should remain, in a state of delight (ramito), in the grove. He should meditate at the foot of a tree, satisfying himself. (709)

We assume the injunction to meditate is designed not just for religious purposes but to function as a visible instance of the monk's uniqueness measured by his capacity to cut himself off by use of meditative practices. In addition, it is likely that it was a deliberate decision that the injunction requiring the monk to return to the village in order to engage in begging should follow these two verses. It is a means of recording the causal relation between the contemplative lifestyle and the capacity it gives to remain separate from all his surroundings even when surrounded by the forces of socialization and acculturation which the monk originally renounced in order to become a monk.

But the monk does have to eat, and this means an element of socialization with villagers as verse 710 enjoins, a socialization which is severely limited.

Then at the end of the night, he should take himself to a village. He should not rejoice at an invitation or a present from the village.

A clear statement of neutrality and complete detachment from any external influence, this attitude makes full sense in terms of the Buddhist emphasis on psychological and social detachment. Equally, it could also establish the monk as somebody who could be approached for advice without any fear of partiality or desire for reward. The next verse confirms this:

Having come to a village, a sage should not pursue his search for food inconsiderately (sahasā) among the families. Cutting off all conversation, he should not utter a word with an ulterior motive. (711)

The two verses following this reiterate what has just been said, implicitly stressing the uniqueness of the holy man and his need to live within and without the village, a perfect position from which to be able to give advice that is not actuated by any other motive than to present a situation as it should be seen within the context of Buddhist ethical teaching. The subsequent verses are more difficult to comprehend in an unambiguous sense, enjoining acuity (716) in the same breath as restraint in food, the need neither to have an inactive mind, nor to think too much (717), almost a statement of the middle way.

The mediatory role requires the capacity to communicate effectively between different cultural groups and so communications skills and knowledge of conditions – metropolitan and local – will be essential qualifications. Yet any communication skills the monk may possess are severely qualified. Restraint of speech is stressed in 723 and often elsewhere, as in 850:

Without anger, without trembling, not boasting, without remorse, speaking in moderation, not arrogant, he indeed is a sage who is restrained in speech.

Note the negatives here, all redolent of cutting away from the kind of emotive discourse associated with everyday life that the sage/monk is required to eschew. Restrained use of language could also be seen as a reflection of the monk's refusal to be captured by a particular view, a position put often in the Sn and yet another requirement for the development of impartiality required of the mediator.

Much of what we find in later sections (especially Book IV) of the Sn stresses how crucial it is for a bhikkhu not to cling to a particular view, the consequence of which is to take positions in a dualistic sense. VI 5 is especially pointed on this subject, as 798 teaches:

That very (view) the experts call a tie, dependent upon which he sees the rest as inferior. Therefore a bhikkhu should not depend upon (anything) seen, heard or thought, or virtuous conduct and vows.

Further

Abandoning what has been taken up, and not taking it up (again), he should not depend even upon knowledge. He indeed does not follow any faction amongst those who hold different views (sā ve viyuttesu na vaggasārī). He does not fall back on any view at all. (800, cf. 371, 912, cf. 845–6)

And the effect:

By him not even a minute notion has been formed here in respect of what is seen, heard or thought. How could anyone here in the world have doubts (kenīdha lokasmim vikappayeyya) about that brahmin, who does not adopt a view? (801)

Despite the play on words between the pādas, it may be too free an interpretation to take this as a judgement about the bhikkhu and the acceptance of his status by the general public. Nonetheless the stressing of the distinction between those who still cling to views and the bhikkhu who has renounced all such is utterly clear.

But what other clues do we have about the public attitude towards this idealized vision of the bhikkhu/muni depicted here? Two verses are quite specific about the monk's acceptance of commonplace opinions:

That on account of which the common people (puṭhujjanā), and ascetics and brahmins, might accuse him, is not preferred by him. Therefore he is not agitated in (the midst of) their accusations. (859)

A man with knowledge does not get involved at all with whatever opinions are commonplace (sammutiyo puṭhujjā). Why should a man who is without involvement (anūpayo) become involved (upayaṃ . . . eyya), when he shows no preference for what is seen and heard. (897)

Surely this is the point. The Vinaya texts, which are not straightforwardly normative in the way of the Sn, show us that the monks do become constantly involved in the life of the laity, even if this involvement does not correspond to the kind of mediation we are writing about in this book. That so many verses in the Sn repeat the injunction of 897 is a recognition on the part of the compilers of the text that monks, because of their eremitic lifestyle and their need to visit villages, often daily, had to cultivate the sense of detachment necessary for preventing the 'attachment, clinging, involvement' associated with the acquisition of new karma. In this it is consistent with everything Buddhism teaches, especially in its more contemplative aspects, yet it establishes the conditions for the monk to give unprejudiced advice, whether or not the authors of the text were aware that this was what they may have been teaching. Involvement is unavoidable, but it should not lead to attachment.

Sections IV.13–IV.15 of the Chapter of Eights repeat substantially the injunctions given in the previous verse and several of the other verses cited above. Section IV.14 does not differ appreciably in its teachings from this, but is slightly more expansive in depicting the bhikkhu as a totally autonomous island in the midst of a sea of turmoil. This theme is expressed already in 915 where the Buddha is asked about detachment (viveka) – psychological as much as social – and peace, and its direct opposite, avoidance of grasping in the world (anupādiyāno lokasmim). The world is, of course, saṃsāra, and given the emphasis early Buddhist doctrine places on the individual's creation of saṃsāra through the mind, the teachings which will follow have a dual ambience; they define the mind's grasping what it perceives in the world and the monk's relations with the world after he has learnt to detach himself from false perceptions. That is, the monk is still in the world, though not of it: paradoxically, it is this quality which gives him his facility for mediation.

So often in these verses the world is described in psychological terms of ties, motivated by grasping. Because it was probably so difficult to attain to a level of complete psychological detachment, the Sn and other Buddhist texts take great pains to describe attachment and its content. Sometimes though, normative texts like the Sn do present the monk in the more empirical conditions he must have encountered in his wanderings.

He would not pay much attention to sleep. Being energetic he would apply himself to wakefulness. He would abandon sloth, deception, laughter, sport, (and) sexual intercourse, together with their appurtenances. (926)

He would not practise Atharva charms, or (interpretation of) dreams, or signs, or even astrology. My follower would not devote himself to (the interpretation of animal) cries, or (the art of) impregnation, or healing. (cf. 927, 360)

A bhikkhu would not tremble at blame; he would not be puffed up when praised. He would thrust aside greed together with avarice, anger and slander. (928)

A bhikkhu would not engage in buying or selling; he would not incur blame in any respect. He would not linger (nābhisajjeya) in a village; he would not talk boastfully to people with a desire for gain. (929)

We suggest these are included here as injunctions because Buddhist monks may on occasion have gone beyond the required detachment from mundane life and, like other holy men, have acted as advisers on the basis of status acquired from their perceived spiritual power, a quality that would have made them attractive to some laypeople. Verse 927 is reminiscent of some of the occupations listed in the Brahmajālasutta and almost certainly represents the manner in which some monks would have acted and in which many brahmins did, in fact, act. Similar is 929 which recommends against basic mercantile activities of a kind that could not help but plunge the monk into the mundane life of the village, a danger surely implied in the use of abhisajj 'linger' (Norman) which semantically corresponds with clinging and attachment.

The śāstric style marked by the continued use of the optative makes these verses reminiscent more of dharmaśāstric literature than they do of Vinaya rules. The effect of the injunctions they encode is to distinguish sharply the Buddhist monk from the other varieties of holy men who would have had no hesitation in using their powers, gained from tapas performed in the forest, to enhance their status, especially in village society where they would have had fewer competitors than in the urban environment of the large towns. But leaving aside the restraining effect of the injunctions, we must note that on the positive side they maintain the image (and the actuality) of the monk as an aloof figure, involved in none of the mundane activities of the village and known by the village population to be such. He could be approached for advice in the full knowledge that he would not take sides in any of the disputes known to have occurred in the village, that pecuniary reward would have no influence on him, that he was not tied into the society in the manner of the brahmin.

Finally, the Sn contains a few verses which can be taken as indicating the high status of the ascetic at the Buddha's time, a status surely essential for underscoring the validity of the mediatory role. An instance is the opinion of Sabhiya who believes, 'An ascetic (samaṇo) is not to be despised nor to be treated with contempt because he is young. Even if an ascetic is young he has great power and influence (so ca hoti mahiddhiko mahānubhāvo)' (prose p. 93). This is not repeated elsewhere in this text, but the whole thrust of the many other verses (see the whole of III 6 on Sabhiya) is to reaffirm the image of the bhikkhu/brāhmaṇa/samaṇa as utterly detached and gone beyond any ties to the world. This virtually superhuman detachment must have been a powerful factor in allowing the judgement suggested in the sentence just cited to be made. It is well known from Hindu literature of various ages that ascetics could be rogues, but this roguishness must have been measured against this stringent standard of detachment rehearsed so often in the Sn.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

Given the emphasis on detachment and isolation the Sn teaches, it is a little surprising that a few passages contain highly concentrated statements about social life in the world of the putthujjana. The Sn demonstrates very clearly the contrast between social engagement and spiritual isolation, but to understand the need for isolation, an equivalent understanding of the conditions of society, beyond the more abstract psychological conditions associated with mental attachment to worldly things, was needed. Every indication in the Canon is that the Buddha had an excellent knowledge of social mores and different cultures. In the Sn passages containing such information are significant for our argument in suggesting the monk's acceptance of the reality of social networks and aspirations and his own need to be able to deal with these from the perspective of Buddhist ethics. Section 1.6 of the Uragavagga details the defining features of the 'unsuccessful man'⁸ (parābhavantam purisaṃ), which means a man who will ultimately be unsuccessful within business or in terms of social values centred on family cohesion across generations. Here is a list of the causes given in summary:

He does not like (Buddhist) doctrine. 92

Bad men (asanta) associate with him. 94

He sleeps too much, likes company, is lazy and subject to anger. 96

He does not support his parents when they are old. 97

He lies to anybody. 99

A wealthy man enjoys his wealth alone (eko bhūñjati sādūni). 102

Arrogance leads him to disregard his own kinsman. 104

He squanders wealth because of women, gambling and alcohol. 106

He betrays his own wife, he is seen with prostitutes and other women.

108

As an old man he brings home a young girl and lusts for her. 110

He puts wrong people into positions of authority. 112

He can be a man of little wealth but huge desire, like a khattiya who wants to be a king. 114

The conclusion (115) is brief, stating that a wise man who possesses insight will enjoy the auspicious world (lokaṃ bhajate svam). Arguably section 1.7 is an extension of this teaching, offering a range of reasons as to why a person can be called an 'outcaste' (vasala), a category that seems also to be confused with those of samaṇa and muṇḍaka.⁹

The parallel of the content of these verses with the passage from the Vinaya cited in chapter 3 and also with the Sigālovādasutta is striking, and reaffirms how strong was the Buddha's knowledge of the new economic elite and how acute were his observations as to how wealth, when gained, could be kept. But these admonitions are not simply about maintenance of wealth; they are also about maintenance of status that must have accrued to the man who has acquired wealth either from land or mercantile activity.

Their opposite is given in II.4 (258) when a deva comes and asks the Buddha to adjudicate about 'auspicious things' (maṅgalāni 'good fortunes' N). Of the verses which follow, 259–64 virtually give the opposite of the twelve reasons for becoming an unsuccessful man. Verses 265–9, however, are more applicable to the monk, rehearsing the qualities of detachment, mental calmness and the practice of austerities.

⁸ See Norman's discussion of this word in The Group of Discourses, p. 168.

⁹ See prose preceding vs. 116. Because of the correlation of these three terms it is possible this entire section could be read as a description of the conditions under which a monk or an ascetic becomes regarded as a rogue.

These passages can be taken as a guide to the kind of knowledge a monk should possess and, more pointedly, give advice upon, and so demonstrate with clarity the degree to which a monk's knowledge should cover an extensive range of affairs, and not just be restricted narrowly to the understanding of the dhamma. In truth, the dhamma was extended to the social world of ethics and honesty, meaning that the monk had to be able to give advice on matters pertaining to business and social interaction. This knowledge would have been regarded as valuable by a layperson only if a monk was recognized as transcending the conditions in which such knowledge would be valuable to him in a material sense. His advice would be sought because, as an outsider, he had no personal interest in the result to be gained from the application of his advice. Verse 268 exemplifies this when saying of the person enjoying 'supreme good fortune' – a virtual analogy of the monk – that he is one 'whose mind is not shaken when he is touched by the phenomena of the world (phutthassa lokadhammehi cittaṃ yassa na kampatī), being without grief, unpolluted, secure . . .'. In other words, worldly affairs have no effect on him in terms of emotional or physical entanglement within them. The next verse enunciates the consequences of this in saying, 'Having done such things, (being) unconquered everywhere, they go everywhere in safety (sabbatthā sotthiṃ gacchanti) . . .' Thus, in many ways, our text sets out the ideal condition for one who would play a mediatory role between different groups.

The Dhammapada and the images of the bhikkhu

294 Destroying mother and father and two khattiya kings, destroying [likewise] the country and the attendant (sānucāra),¹ the brahmin comports himself (carati) without trembling.

295 Destroying mother and father and two learned (sotthiya) kings, destroying also those (hindrances) of which the fifth is like a tiger (veyyagha), the brahmin comports himself without trembling.

At first glance, these two verses from the Dhammapada may look like a volley of polemic against the Buddhists' rivals for popular influence, the brahmin priests. The impression will not last long, however. Buddhist complaints against brahmins do not normally allege savage and degenerate criminality; they lament rather the corruption of present-day brahmins who have fallen from the high standards set by the wise and diligent priests of old. The Buddha is very commonly represented as praising the true brahmin, the one who seeks enlightenment, cultivating restraint and virtue.

The later Pāli commentarial tradition automatically interprets these verses as a celebration of the achievements of the truth-seeker who follows in the footsteps of the Buddha and finds enlightenment through spiritual cultivation. The brahmin is this seeker, and his victims are metaphors: mother and father are craving and egoism or self-conceit, the two kings are the false beliefs in eternalism and annihilationism, the country is the senses and their spheres, the attendant (or revenue officer) is the pursuit of sensory pleasure, and the tiger's domain is the group of five hindrances of which sceptical doubt, seen as a source of fear like the tiger, is the fifth member.²

¹ Literally, 'with the follower(s)' (Rhys Davids and Stede (eds), Pali-English Dictionary, s.v. sānucāra). The metaphor likens the government apparatus of a kingdom (in the Pāli commentary, 'revenue officer') to the bases and objects of the senses.

² The annotated edition and translation of the Dhammapada by J. R. Carter and M. Palihawadana, Dhammapada (Oxford University Press, New York, 1987), is the authority in this chapter for references to the Pāli commentary, which is extensively used by the editors in their notes.

Certainly the Ceylonese tradition is correct in taking the term brāhmaṇo here as equivalent to arahant. These are not the only verses in this text where normally pejorative expressions are used in a new and special sense to denote the world-denying values of the seeker after enlightenment.³ But the identification is put beyond doubt by the text's twenty-sixth and last division, the brāhmaṇa-vaggo, in which verses commemorating the wisdom and serenity of the enlightened monk all end with the words ahaṃ brūmi brāhmaṇam – '[that one] I call a brahmin'. This sustained identification of the ideal Buddhist monk with the socially eminent class of priests, in many other contexts represented as scornful or condescending detractors of the Buddhist saṅgha, must have meant something to the monks and laity through whose interest this text acquired its place in the Canon, and it is clearly of value to examine what resonances the semantics of such a text could acquire. The Dhammapada, which belongs within the Khuddaka Nikāya, is generally considered to be among the earlier of the collections of canonical material, or at least to contain parts which are early, and, for reasons which matter here, it came to be very popular. Other schools than the Theravāda had their versions of it, and some of these survive.⁴ It consists, as normally edited, of 423 verses grouped under headings according to their main topics. To some extent, the collection is arbitrary, bringing together a wide variety of sayings, some of which occur elsewhere in the Canon. There is no uniting structure of argument, and the themes are various. For the most part, the teachings imparted seem to be exhortations and memoranda for monks living a wandering life, and some of them contain technical points of psychological or ethical doctrine. Yet, for whatever reasons, this anthology came to be treasured in many places.

The text therefore embodies features of the process by which canonical texts acquired meaning and importance in Buddhist culture. The concern of this chapter is with the way in which teachings are likely to have acquired a significance for different audiences, not only monks. The Dhammapada, however it originated, acquired sets of meanings from the cultural contexts in which it figured, and these contexts affect the way in which we read it as a document for the dhamma's historical role.

³ Particularly verse 97 which commemorates faithlessness and other seeming defects. It has sometimes been misunderstood.

⁴ The Sanskrit Udānavarga, the Prakrit Gāndhārī Dharmapada and the Patna Dharmapada. On all of these see Norman, Pāli Literature, pp. 59ff. See also G. Roth, 'Text of the Patna Dharmapada', in H. Bechert (ed.), Die Sprache der ältesten buddhistischen Überlieferung: the Language of the Earliest Buddhist Tradition (Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, Göttingen, 1980), pp. 97–135; K. Mizuno, 'A comparative study of Dharmapadas', in G. Dhammapala, R. Gombrich and K. R. Norman (eds), Buddhist Studies in Honour of Hammalava Saddhātissa (Buddhist Research Library Trust, Nugegoda, 1984), pp. 168–75.

There is not just one meaning which uniquely and absolutely belongs to such a text. There is indeed an original intention in the mind of whoever first uttered each verse; and it is certainly of value to seek plausible inferences about the character of these intentions. For what it is worth, the great majority of the verses can be read as statements about the values of the wandering monk, lacking possessions and deliberately cutting himself loose from the entanglements of social relationships and worldly status. That is, the Dhammapada could well be used to support the claim that, so far as an original Buddhism can be recovered (however quickly augmented by other Buddhisms), it was the solitary pursuit of enlightenment through meditation and a moderately ascetic lifestyle. The present chapter, though, is concerned with the further claim that, by being spoken and listened to in different contexts, these verses acquired other meanings as well.

The Ceylonese scholar-monks of later centuries read it in a particular way. Like the original anonymous authors of the several verses, they wished to forge a tool of monkish discipline conducive to the pursuit of spiritual goals and to a mode of life that would uphold the highest standards of the saṅgha. Unlike the original authors, they were interested in the text as an object of intellectual analysis, they used an elaborate technical vocabulary of Buddhist psychology, and they cultivated erudition in the traditional lore that had been transmitted alongside the Canon, containing numerous stories that could be used in explanation of the meaning of obscure passages. But, between the original authors and the Ceylonese monks, there was a series of other participants in the tradition, shadowy but indispensable to its evolution. The teachings passed on by older monks to novices in edifying verses were not, after all, secrets. They embodied the dhamma that the Buddha offered to all with an open hand. Whatever features made them easy for novices to learn would, up to a point, have made them easy for lay followers. It stands to reason that they would often have been used in the course of dhamma talks by monks to lay groups and individuals, recited with emphasis as wise and ancient sayings invested with the authority of the earliest saṅgha. Much in the Dhammapada is apt for such purposes, as indeed are other texts that came to be grouped in the Khuddaka Nikāya. The Dhammapada has the character of an anthology, its units consisting of single verses or of pairs or generally short sequences of verses, and such a selection from available stock, eventually compiled by selection according to value, is particularly likely to have responded to its effectiveness in providing material for dhamma talks as well as its perceived importance for the wandering monk's own spiritual cultivation. Over the generations, the reciting of verses could give them meanings on different levels, all congruent with a set of core ideas and values but meeting the needs of different audiences.

To be quite specific, we can read here not only messages for wandering monks but also messages for ordinary people in the settlements where the monks came with their teachings, and for the representatives of expanding states in their dealings with subject communities. That is, to over-simplify somewhat, there were folk and there were public or political messages. That is, the text served both the 'asocial' version of Buddhism and the 'social', the latter in both its Great Tradition and its Little Tradition forms as described above in the Introduction. The monks who delivered these messages were able to face in two directions – towards the subject communities, where people needed ways of accommodating the forces of an intrusive and threatening outside world to their indigenous traditions, and towards the expanding state, which needed a new ideology of universal values capable of reinterpreting the rulers' ancestral culture and bringing together a multiplicity of disparate communities lacking shared traditions. The dhamma fitted the monks to function as intermediaries, each party able to read its own needs in their teachings.

Let us take first the public or political messages. They represent an important aspect of religion familiar in other traditions.

Doctrines important in the evolution of a religion, whether as orthodoxy or heresy, can often be read as encoded political statements. To say this is not to say anything about their real spiritual meaning, and it is not to offer any simplistic reduction of religious statements to political ones; it is only to recognize that, in its historical interaction with the profane world, a religion inevitably comes to be involved in political issues, and rival doctrines (however indifferent to worldly values originally) become tokens in the debate between political interests. To identify the political content of a doctrine is not to exhaust its meaning, but it may help us to see how the doctrine played a part in society.

However complex the assessment of such propositions may be, they indicate ways in which doctrine may come to function as a badge of political interest. The lines of political interest in ancient India are mere speculative reconstructions from the mist of history for us now, but they surely acted to give meaning to often-repeated doctrinal formulae.

393 Not by matted locks, not by clan, not by birth is one a brahmin. He is the brahmin, he the pure, in whom there is truth and dhamma.

395 One who wears a garment made of rags, who is emaciated, marked by spreading veins (dhamanisanthatam), a solitary meditator in the forest – him do I call a brahmin.

405 The one who, abandoning the rod [of punishment] in dealing with all beings, the movable and the immovable (those who lack and those who possess calmness and restraint, tasesu thāvaresu ca), who does not kill and does not have killed – him do I call a brahmin.

Here the values of the meditating monk, who cultivates asceticism and pacifism, are squarely equated to the status of brahmin. Yet those who received this message knew that brahmins were people qualified by birth to study the Vedas and officiate at sacrifices. Rulers employed brahmins to perform rituals, and bestowed offerings upon brahmins as demonstrations of power. The radical reinterpretation of such an institution inevitably challenged orthodox ideas.

Buddhism had to be adapted substantially to function as an alternative to the brāhmaṇical ideology. Buddhism as it first took shape rejected the ritual and kin-based claims of the tight-knit group, and with its prescriptions for the wandering, independent life of the solitary ascetic, it likewise rejected the claims of political organization, secular or otherwise. If it was to serve the purposes of the expanding state, it had to be reinterpreted. It already had the universal values, but it lacked an appropriate term by which authority could be mediated.

On a strict interpretation, it was indeed antagonistic to any involvement in authorities and networks. The Dhammapada itself is a good text for the ascetic detachment of original Buddhism: the eradication of all craving, of all attachment to the bonds of sensual gratification. The emphasis is upon inner freedom, won by mastery of the recalcitrant elements within one's own mind; but it is a freedom that works outwards to the calming of attachment even to the closest of one's possessions:

62 A fool is vexed (vihāññati) thinking: 'I have sons, I have wealth'; but there exists no self belonging to oneself, so how much less can there be sons, how much less wealth?

Any sort of attachment, any vestige of craving, is to be patiently eradicated. One whole division of the text, the taṇhā-vaggo, is devoted to verses teaching the elimination of craving. For example:

353 I am the conqueror of all, the knower of all, undefiled (anūpalitto) amid all dhammas, abandoning all, released at the destruction of craving; what teacher can I have, when I myself comprehend all?

Such a doctrine, unadapted, could not serve the purposes of state organization. It rejected the claims of society upon the individual; it thus lacked principles apt for the validation of authority. Traditionally, this sort of validation was associated with brahmins. Everybody accepted that there were invisible forces and beings capable of affecting human fortunes; through the brahmins a particular community could as a unit make contact with this beyond through the sacrifice in order to ward off dangers or attract benefits; the patron capable of sponsoring this contact thereby had sacrally legitimized authority. Before urban-based kingdoms began to spread into new areas, while the culture of a state was still homogeneous, priestly sacrifice was the appropriate expression of a ruler's authority; the Upaniṣads tell stories of kings making lavish offerings to brahmins, who competed for patronage.⁵ But in the new world of the rising northeastern states things had to be different; a new sort of contact with the beyond mediated by a holy man was needed. Sacrifice was denigrated, and the spiritual self-mastery of the holy man became the new vehicle of superhuman forces no longer conceived of in terms supplied by myths of familiar gods.

Seen from outside, ascetic values could be reinterpreted: the arahant, the holy man, precisely to the extent that he was uninvolved in social relationships and authority structures, became in his own person the vessel of offering, replacing the brāhmaṇical sacrifice:

106 One person might make a thousand offerings month after month in sacrifices a hundred times over, and another might offer worship for one moment to him whose self is spiritually refined (bhāvitattānaṃ); the (latter) worship is better than what is offered for a hundred years.

The redefinition of the brahmin as a holy man, and the devaluation of sacrifice in favour of worship offered to the spiritually pure, fit the dhamma as an ideology for the validation of state authority. The holy man's very indifference to social relationships and political hierarchy magnifies his value; the more spiritually pure he is, the greater the value of worship offered to him, and by the making of offerings to monks the state can attach itself to the moral power of cosmic forces.

Hence the domestication of Buddhism in the expanding state modelled it upon the structure of brahmanism. Certainly, in many contexts, holy men such as the wandering Buddhist mendicants were contrasted as a category with the worldly brahmins; but sometimes, equally, the two categories could be twinned as sharers in the profession of sacred knowledge. This is the sense apparent in the Aśokan inscriptions, in which reverence towards śramaṇas and brahmins is enjoined as part of Aśoka's own dhamma or code of social morality. Aśoka's empire is the supreme example of an expanding state in which many cultures were brought together; we should expect to see in it Buddhist values superimposed upon brāhmanical religion.

⁵ For example, see BrhU 3.1.1.

This equation provided a lever for the redefinition of an ascetic teaching in terms suitable for the culture of an expanding state. The embodiment of this function was patronage, the making of offerings to holy men for the practical benefit of the community. Sometimes extravagant claims are made for the amount of merit earned by making offerings to spiritually advanced monks, and we should see in this the possibility of another audience, the political one for which the point of the monk's spiritual advancement was as a suitable vehicle for sacramental actions by the representatives of the community. Such actions were to be praised even if they did not issue in any food or comforts for monks, but simply consisted of honour and respect:

108 Whatever oblation or sacrificial offering a seeker after merit may make in the world for a year long, even the whole of it is not worth one quarter as much as what is better – to give honour to those whose going is straight [i.e., leads to enlightenment].

An ideology suitable for the expanding state in a culturally diverse environment needs to dispense with particularistic traditions such as sacrifice. What had to take their place was a concept of virtue which was neutral towards birth and community. Buddhist teachings were not the only ones to redefine the sacrificial act in moral terms; but they proved particularly appropriate to the changing environment.

The concept of karma as a moral law of cause and effect was not of course new with Buddhism, but the Buddhist interpretation of it had advantages from the point of view of the secular state. The Buddhist karma was pre-eminently psychological and moral – the effects of karma were determined by the moral quality of the agent's intentions. This gave a strongly ethical cast to Buddhist cosmology.⁶

Actions could have consequences for those who performed them from their moral (not ritual or mechanical) character, and a science of virtue was integral to an ideology of universal values.⁷ The dhamma teachings of the monks therefore emphasized the role of kamma, in its sense of moral cause and effect, and when we read in their texts of the importance of liberality or other virtues it is this process of ethicization that we must recognize; it was not just edification for the novice – it was intensely relevant to the concerns of the wider urban culture of the state.

⁶ The imposition of a theory of good and bad actions upon a previously impersonal or amoral cosmology, a concept identified by Weber as ethicization, has been discussed in its application to Buddhism by G. Obeyesekere, 'Theodicy, sin and salvation in the sociology of religion', in E. R. Leach (ed.), Dialectic in Practical Religion (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1968), p. 21.

Thus many of the maxims of the Dhammapada read like exhortations to upright conduct in society:

50 One should not bother about the anomalies or the commissions and omissions in the case of others; one should bother about one's own commissions and omissions.

55 There are the scents of sandalwood, rhododendron, lotus, and jasmine, but the scent of virtue (sīla) is incomparable.⁸

57 Māra [death personified] cannot find the path of those who are endowed with virtue, who are not lacking in mindfulness, liberated by right knowledge.

78 One should not consort with bad friends or inferior people; one should consort with worthy friends and with superior people.

Frequently enough the context clearly refers to the concerns of the ascetic monk, but the vocabulary is appropriate for the celebration of social virtue, as where praise is lavished on one who initiates resolute enterprise (viriyam ārabhato dalham, Dhṛp 112). Similarly the section on dhamma (Dhp 256–72), concerned with righteousness in following the ascetic path, can be read as teaching righteousness as embodied in society. Any empire in the making had to deal with a multitude of communities with different customs, and fairness to all was important.

256 One is not an upholder of righteousness (dhammātṭho) by making a wild decision; a wise man will decide only after considering both what is and what is not the case.

257 A wise man, a protector of righteousness (dhammassa), governs others⁹ with impartial righteousness, without wildness, and he is called an upholder of righteousness.

⁷ There is an important parallel here in the way that Confucianism imposed a moral framework upon an old magico-auguristic cosmology. As Waley has written about the concept of te, often translated 'virtue', 'Only when the moralistic position was thoroughly established, that is to say, after the doctrines of Confucianism had become a State orthodoxy, did te, at any rate among the upper classes, come to mean what we usually mean by virtue.' A. Waley (ed. and trans.), The Way and its Power: A Study of the Tao Tē Ching and its Place in Chinese Thought (Grove Press, New York, 1958), p. 32.

⁸ The meanings of the botanical terms in Pāli are not at all certain. Here the translation of Daw Mya Tin is followed, The Dhammapada (Rangoon, 1993).

⁹ Lit. 'lead others', nayati pare. On variant readings, see the Carter and Palihawadana edn, p. 480, n. 3.

Here the word translated ‘impartial’ is samena, ‘same’, ‘uniform’, and it reflects the concern for uniform justice that is evinced also by Aśoka’s inscriptions: sameness or fairness is to be desired, he says, in trials and punishments.¹⁰

In a kingdom where the ruler sought to impose a new universal code, as Aśoka did, the message of abstention from harm, a monkish virtue, was also apt as a principle of state, and a division of the Dhammapada (29–145) preaches the virtue of restraint towards all beings.

129 All are afraid of the rod (daṇḍassa); all are afraid of death; putting oneself in the place of another, one should not harm or kill others.

This is exactly what Aśoka claimed to have done after the appalling loss of life caused by his war with Kalinga; he sought to replace conquest by the sword with conquest by his own dhamma.

137 He who harms those who are harmless, without offence, will quickly go to one of the ten (harmful) states.

These are then listed; they are physical and material sufferings, including notably ‘danger from the king’. If we imagine a king or a minister listening to the rhythmically insistent exhortations to virtue embodied in the text, it is easy to understand how it could speak to the ethics of government. Aśoka’s own code of social morality is clearly at one with the message about reverence to seniors:

109 For one whose custom is constantly to respect and give honour to the aged, four benefits (dhammā) increase – longevity, complexion, contentment and strength.

This is remarkably like the teaching of Aśoka’s edicts, which commonly exhort his subjects to honour parents along with brahmins and śramaṇas. The original intention may have concerned respect to senior monks, but the projection to society at large is readily made.¹¹

The social ethic appropriate to the management of a large state containing heterogeneous cultures demands values of fairness and respect. It cannot easily be combined with local cults and culture-bound myths. Hence the appeal of the impersonal rule of moral law, kamma. One group of verses insistently links actions with moral consequences:

¹⁰ Pillar Edict 4: ichitaviye hi esā kinti viyobāla-samatā ca siya daṇḍa samatā.

¹¹ Aśoka’s concern with social harmony and bonds of respect is evident for example in Rock Edicts 3, 4, 7, 9–11 and all Pillar Edicts.

67 That deed is not well done which one regrets after performing it, experiencing the consequence of it with tears and weeping.

68 That deed is well done which one does not regret after performing it, experiencing the consequence of it with delight and happiness.

69 So long as a bad deed does not bear fruit, the foolish one thinks it sweet as honey; but, when the bad deed bears fruit, then the foolish one undergoes suffering.

There are many such aphorisms. To the modern ear, they may sound banal, rather like many of the platitudes attributed to Confucius – which is an apt analogy, since his teachings similarly imposed a framework of impersonal morality upon an older culture of ritual, supplying an ideology for the state. However, what gave them freshness to their first hearers, as well as authority for later generations, is their promise of contact with the forces that govern our lives, not through a priest with controversial cultural credentials, but through virtue. Such a programme could only commend itself to growing state power.

None of this is intended to suggest that the Dhammapada or any other text was consciously redacted in order to interest the rulers of kingdoms in the potential of the Buddhist dhamma to furnish a state orthodoxy. The verses generally reflect the ascetic values of original Buddhism, and were composed chiefly with a view to keeping in the monk's mind a clear understanding of the noble path. But audiences invisible to the modern reader had a hand in the history of a text that has attained such a rank as has the Dhammapada, influencing the selection of maxims and helping to give the collection its final shape. One such audience was the expanding state.

But the early saṅgha, with its ascetic values, faced in two directions, and by being able to do so was able to supply an essential joint in the articulation of a multi-cultural society. One direction, just considered, was towards the state. The other was towards the towns and villages, especially communities far removed in culture and power from the dominant urbanized groups. There are various ways in which popular Buddhist texts demonstrate the orientation of the saṅgha in this direction, towards popular culture. A particularly important one has to do with the attitude of ordinary people to ascetic holy men coming as outsiders among them. The dhamma held up high ideals of detachment and passionlessness running strongly counter to ordinary human nature. There were soteriological reasons for such teaching; but it is easy to overlook their implications for laymen who came to know about them, however little inclined they might be to adopt ascetic ideals themselves.

We must picture the wandering monks arriving as strangers, ready to impart an unfamiliar dhamma to any who would listen. If they were lucky, or had the appropriate talents or personality, the monks inspired trust, and if they stayed long enough or visited often enough they would become familiar and eventually become part of the local scene, valued perhaps as healers, counsellors or seers. Of course they had not been trained as counsellors in village politics, as umpires, as go-betweens, as interpreters of government demands, or as vehicles of healing power or sacred energy, but what matters is simply that their carefully studied calmness, detachment, dignity and lack of private agenda were likely to be excellent qualifications for just such roles; we see the same thing happening today in remote rural areas visited by forest monks.

The texts which teach the importance of these qualities therefore must be recognized as signals to laymen who knew something about the discipline and education of monks. The teaching that a monk should aim at a seemingly superhuman indifference to his surroundings could be recognized within the saṅgha as a discipline for focusing upon the path, but it was also an assurance to laymen that monks were expected to live by a much higher standard than ordinary mortals, perhaps thereby gaining a higher state that would give them special powers and insight.

35 The mind (citta) is hard to hold on to firmly, volatile (lahuno), alighting where it fancies, and it is good to have control of it; a controlled mind brings satisfaction.

37 The mind roams far afield, wandering on its own, bodiless, lying hid; those who can restrain the mind are released from the bonds of Māra.

That is, those who succeeded in meeting the demands of the Vinaya were able to reach a status inaccessible to ordinary people. This aspiration was not seen as mere rhetoric; it was a believable consequence of the strenuous self-purification ideally expected of monks. Those monks whose aloof detachment and apparent wisdom were truly impressive might inspire the belief that they actually possessed the awe-inspiring superhuman powers recognized among the fruits of arahantship.

They were supposed to have eradicated all craving, and to be uninvolved in worldly concerns, uninterested in receiving honour and veneration:

75 The way of gaining possessions (lābhūpanisā) is one thing, and the passage to nibbāṇa is another. A mendicant (bhikkhu) who recognizes this to be so should not rejoice in receiving veneration (sakkāra), but should cherish his detachment (viveka).

Even the gods loved one who had complete control over his mind (Dhp 94), and such a being was not subject to the round of samsāra (Dhp 95).

The description of the arahant is reminiscent of the shadowy forest spirits thought to haunt the wilds in modern times; he is elusive, unaffected by normal physical influences, and not dependent upon sustenance (ābhāre ca anissito: Dhṛp 93). It is his calmness that will instantly mark him out: 'Calm is his mind, calm his speech and action' (Dhṛp 96). One who is steadfast, moderate and restrained, 'Māra in no degree can defeat, any more than the wind can defeat a mountain crag' (Dhṛp 8). One who conquered the defilements (āsava) with self-control and with truth was truly worthy of his robe (Dhṛp 9–10); here the laity could read a clear message that it should distinguish between the worthy and unworthy and respond accordingly. The true monks, the virtuosi, gained a higher consciousness that enabled them to overcome even death:

21 Awareness (appamādo) is the abode of deathlessness; lack of awareness is the abode of death. Those who have awareness do not die; those who lack it perish.

From the point of view of a monk, no doubt, lack of awareness was a familiar obstacle to successful meditation, a natural human propensity to relaxation and distraction. The term appamādo covers all the monk's needed qualities of mindful consciousness. From the point of view of the layman, awareness was something superhuman, setting its possessor upon a higher plane. Awareness is stressed in many verses, and the second division, Appamādo-vagga, is devoted to it.

The Dhammapada, therefore, could function as a guide for the lay population (from which, after all, every monk had to be recruited) to the qualities of an advanced monk, and an assurance of the value of the attainments of such a person. How could the villagers hope to benefit?

Here it is useful to consider the type of cosmology, implicit in folk ways of thought rather than specified in any particular system, that gave meaning to contact with holy men in disparate local cultures not necessarily versed in Vedic lore or its associated myths. The rudiments of such a cosmology can be detected in the texts of dhamma.

One verse, likening the passing mendicant to a bee taking off pollen, is eloquent:

49 Just as a bee takes nectar from a flower and flies away without harming its colour and fragrance, so would a sage pass through a village.

The bee disappears into its abode in the wilds to make honey, which is sweet and sustaining. Similarly, the mendicant takes away something from the villagers, and in some sense he transforms it, for their benefit.

What he takes away is the offering placed in his bowl. He takes it away and eats it, thereby enabling the donors to obtain the benefit of his own advanced spirituality. This transaction fits easily within the world of popular cosmological belief in almost any folk culture.

But there had to be stringent conditions. No mere ritual giving was likely to be efficacious. The recipient had to be purified, wholly unlike ordinary people. It was necessary to purge away his own human frailty, the clutter of selfishness and ignorance that had constituted his ego before he became a monk, for these could only smother the offering and prevent the action upon it of cosmic forces. In simple terms, the purification was effected by emptying himself, making himself a blank. The begging bowl was a good symbol of this emptiness: one places one's offering within the bowl, which is a pure vehicle of selflessness, empty space, without distinction or adornment, and the bowl is taken away to be used in a sacramental act of eating, subject to remarkably elaborate rules of discipline designed to ensure that involuntary manifestations of personal pleasure do not sully the enactment. Some forest monks today take a great deal of trouble to make their bowls duly anonymous, ensuring that they have a uniform dull matt finish. Monks also keep up rigorously the ancient routine of collecting offerings, going by the village doorways so that householders can make their individual offerings. This is done even where the begging round is not strictly necessary – lay supporters later come to the vihāra and prepare a proper meal.

So the holy man has to be, in an important sense, a blank space. The particular fleshly mortal being is transmuted, becomes an insubstantial image of a reality that lives on a higher plane, cannot be localized and is without individual personality. Something of this idea can be detected in the Dhammapada:

93 One in whom the defilements [āsavā] are thoroughly destroyed, who is not tied to [a source of] sustenance, whose territory is freedom, void and unmarked – the passage of such a one is hard to trace (durannayam) like that of birds in the sky.

Lay Buddhist understanding of nibbāna has proved a complication for the study of Buddhism in its social setting: though theoretically of supreme importance, for the ordinary Buddhist it is remote, obscure and uninteresting as a goal of aspiration.

Yet it instantly becomes central, and acquires a major role in the sociology of Buddhism, when we shift perspective and treat its occurrence in a text not as the specification of the most desirable goal worth aspiring after for oneself but as a description of something that happens to other people. If the monk obtains nibbāna, or if he even sets his feet firmly upon the road that leads in the right direction, then offerings given to him will surely earn the highest possible benefit.

There are several references to nibbāna in the Dhammapada, all celebrating it as the summit of a holy man's self-purification. He studies mindfulness, aiming at nibbāna, thereby eliminating the āsavas (Dhp 226). Nibbāna is the supreme contentment (paramam sukham, Dhp 204), the seat of the deathless (amataṃ padam, Dhp 114), the unshakeable abode (Dhp 225); it is the prize for cutting away all passion and hatred (Dhp 369), masters distraction, and achieves total mindful awareness:

32 The bhikkhu who takes pleasure in awareness (appamāda), seeing danger in lack of awareness, is not likely to lapse (abhabho parihānāya); he is in the vicinity of nibbāna.

Nibbāna thus figures as the seal or crown of the qualities repeatedly emphasized as necessary for the monk seeking salvation – mindfulness, self-control, total detachment, passionlessness. These are qualities which fit a holy man to act as advocate and adviser for the local community in its dealings with the outside world – and also, in a religious sense, qualities which fit him as a medium between the supplicant making offerings and the cosmic forces which can turn the offerings into karmic benefit. There are two levels of action: Buddhism operates both in the public arena, as an integrating social force, and in the context of folk belief, as a superior conduit of sacred energies, but the two converge in the language of spiritual discipline which belongs to neither but is directed to the needs of salvation for the ascetic.

Those who made offerings needed the ascetics to be bent upon nibbāna, but were not seeking it for themselves. What they sought was happiness in this world and the next. Even a 'secular' culture, one with a cosmology privileging impersonal forces, could believe in a next world, so long as access to it was conceived of in impersonal terms not involving divine choice; the doctrine of kamma supplied this. A pair of verses refers to the beyond in terms which made sense to ordinary people; both verses end in the refrain: 'One who observes dhamma sleeps in contentment in this world and the world beyond' (Dhp 168–9). These verses refer in generic terms to the good conduct which conforms to dhamma, but they could also be taken as maxims for upright life in society, not just for monks (though, as usual, the Pāli commentary resolutely interprets them as referring to a monk's spiritual discipline¹²).

Here we can recognize the notion of contentment in a fully imaginable human life, which is more likely to have made sense to most hearers of the text, not as a bodiless abstraction. This is the cultural context in which Buddhism must have had most impact, and it is significant that in Aśoka's inscriptions dhamma is a this-worldly concept, in which nirvāṇa does not figure, but the concept of benefits in this life and the next is likewise present.¹³ Some of the epithets for nibbāṇa, such as 'supreme contentment', suggest images of heavenly happiness, and one verse indeed refers to the heavenly noble land (dibbaṃ ariyabhūmiṃ, Dhp 236) – that is, the heavens in which are reborn those destined for enlightenment and nirvāṇa after one more rebirth.

¹² See the Carter and Palihawadana edn, p. 233. On the tendency of the Theravāda scholastic commentators to apply such textual prescriptions specifically to the discipline of the monks, see G. Bond's review of Carter and Palihawadana, JAOS, 111 (1991), p. 173.

To ordinary lay followers, the dhamma texts alluded to a hierarchy of increasingly happy states, with nibbāṇa as a theoretical abstraction at the top. It was not so much a desirable state to which one could aspire; it was an ideal condition which the better ascetic monks were thought to be approaching, and its significance was precisely that such monks were fitted thereby to act as conduits for the offerings given to them. The actual content of nibbāṇa, as something realized by the ascetic monks, was infinitely less interesting than its value for others.

So benefit for the givers of offerings is mechanically linked to the purity and spiritual advancement of their recipients. Several passages indicate that the merit of offerings to a monk is precisely congruent with that monk's advancement. The propensity to generate bad kamma can be neutralized by offerings to one who has eliminated that propensity.

356 In fields, it is grass [growing as weeds] that is the defect; in humans, it is passion that is the defect. Therefore there is great fruit from what is given to those in whom passion is eliminated.

357 In fields, it is grass [growing as weeds] that is the defect; in humans, it is hatred that is the defect. Therefore there is great fruit from what is given to those in whom hatred is eliminated.

358 In fields, it is grass [growing as weeds] that is the defect; in humans, it is delusion that is the defect. Therefore there is great fruit from what is given to those in whom delusion is eliminated.

359 In fields, it is grass [growing as weeds] that is the defect; in humans, it is desire that is the defect. Therefore there is great fruit from what is given to those in whom desire is eliminated.

¹³ See Major Rock Edict IX (the performance of dhamma leads to merit in the next life: Kālsi version); X (all Aśoka's efforts were 'with a view to the after-life, that all men may escape evil inclinations'); XIII (victory by dhamma is pleasurable only to the extent that it has benefits in the next world); Dhauri and Jaugaḍa Separate Edict (good principles of administration conduce to the attainment of heaven); Second Separate Edict (the border peoples should follow dhamma and thus gain this world and the next); Minor Rock Edict (implying that if people are pious they come nearer to the gods and can reach heaven easily); 1st Pillar Edict (referring to happiness in this world and the next); 4th Pillar Edict (condemned criminals can use their three days' respite to fast for the sake of better rebirth).

Texts such as the Dhammapada, then, could speak in various ways. They could confirm with total authority that a good monk was reliable as a truly detached, unthreatening figure, totally unconnected with the agenda of powerholders in the state. They also described the discipline and training of a monk in ways that represented the holy man as a pre-eminently potent intermediary between the individual or his group and the forces that determine people's fate; these claims were couched in terms that presupposed no local or ancestral cult but appealed to universal values, and yet fitted in with folk beliefs.

These texts were therefore neutral towards different cultures with different repertoires of lore and myth. They contained very little that presupposed a hearer's familiarity with any specific particularistic tradition, such as the brāhmaṇical one. The contrast with brāhmaṇical texts is striking; Vedic and post-Vedic literature is replete with allusions that presuppose knowledge of a rich tradition. The brāhmaṇical texts could draw confidently upon a stock of motifs that had meaning for a whole people – the 'Aryan' communities and their descendants who recognized their brotherhood in the Vedic Sanskrit traditions. The Buddhist texts were different: they did not seek to give expression to an ancestral culture of a particular people, and they expected to deal frequently with communities to which their ideas were unfamiliar.

The difference is measurable in the number of references to mythical beings, in general or as individuals, and, in simple terms, in the frequency of proper names. The Dhammapada, for example, has very few. Gods are mentioned generically at a number of points (Dhp 94, 105, 420), not as specific beings to be invoked but just as part of the background scene. (Dhp 94: 'Even the gods' love one who is passionless and self-controlled; the point is to magnify the achievement of the ascetic, not to say anything about gods.) Gandhabbas, celestial beings, appear alongside humans and gods simply to map the total of beings who are unable to follow the path of an arahant (Dhp 420).

Maghavan (a name of the Vedic Indra) makes an appearance (Dhp 30), but the allusion, as the commentary asserts, is to the story of a young brahmin Magha, who became known as Maghavan.¹⁴ There are very few proper nouns generally. Points are illustrated by reference to the horses from Sindh

¹⁴ Implicitly, perhaps this cuts the Vedic god down to size as a manifestation of karmic rebirth like the rest of us. The Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā tells the story that Sakka, king of the gods, was in a former life Magha, called Maghavā, who came to be reborn as Sakka through good deeds. See E. W. Burlingame (trans.), Buddhist Legends. Translated from the original Pāli Text of the Dhammapada Commentary (Luzac, London, 1969 (Cambridge, Mass., 1921)), part I, pp. 314–19.

(sindhavā) (Dhp 322), and to the elephant Dhanapālaka, which figured in a story (Dhp 324). A group of verses about fault-finding is represented as being spoken to Atula, described in the story as a notorious fault-finder (Dhp 227).¹⁵ There is not much else. The vein of allusion to legendary lore is thin indeed. In the long run, certainly, a rich store of Buddhist legends accumulated, and later sources such as the Jātakas tapped in to a treasury of folk memory; but the canonical texts are simply not concerned with the traditions of particular communities.

There is one exception, which needs to be particularly noticed: Māra, or Yama, Death. This figure is mentioned a number of times, as the enemy who is bested by the holy man.

274 This is the path, there is no other for purification of vision. Take this path; it will confound Māra.

It is not entirely clear just how far this Māra is really personalized in Buddhist thought, but on the whole, in the Dhammapada at least, every mention of him is little more than a metaphor, like references to the Devil in colloquial English. He normally stands for ignorance and attachment that may be overcome by restraint and mindfulness, or for the delusive power of life in saṃsāra which traps ordinary mortals. Sometimes Māra is mentioned not by name but as the king of death (Dhp 170). As a representative of forces to be overcome, he is only weakly personalized (Dhp 7, 8, 40, 175, 276, 350). There are references to 'Māra's flowers', which designated the flux of life in saṃsāra, or the defilements. There can be no certainty how vivid was the concept of Māra as a personal force to be trembled at in the minds of early Buddhists, but it is clear at least that canonical texts such as the Dhammapada did little to encourage the notion of him as a real person active in human affairs.¹⁶

And that is what we should expect in a period when the appeal of the dhamma was to a multi-cultural audience subject to the stresses of encroachment by rising states with their urban culture. Texts have a secular character that is in some ways curiously modern in flavour. Man is in control of his own fate, at least to the extent that present actions can determine future consequences, not dependent upon the favour of personal divine beings. This accords with Mary Douglas' proposition: 'The essential difference between a cosmos dominated by persons and one dominated by objects is the impossibility of bringing moral pressures to bear upon the ¹⁵ Again the story is told by the Dhammapadaṭṭhakathā. See ibid., part III, pp. 113–15.

¹⁶ Dhp, ed. Carter and Palihawadana, p. 442.

controllers: there is no person-to-person communication with them.¹⁷ The small community managed by rituals addressed to gods was being displaced by the large impersonal state.

It was in this situation that monks could play an important part in the articulation of society. To kings and officials, their teachings appeared to offer ideals of peace and harmony within the body politic, where all should respect the wise and cultivate civic virtue. To the subordinate or marginal tribes and clans, their teachings appeared to offer a buffer between the local community and the state, and a culture-neutral mechanism for the accumulation of merit by making offerings.

In this context, the Dhammapada can be read on several levels, according to the several audiences likely to have had a hand in its shaping. For the anonymous individuals originally responsible for the composition of its individual verses, its message was ascetic, directed to those who had wandered forth as mendicants. For the state, its message was political or public; for the little man, it was spoken to folk belief.

This at least is a plausible interpretation, supported by an analysis of the text. Most verses, it should be emphasized, can be adequately understood in the way they were probably first intended, as props to the self-discipline of the mendicant practising meditation and detachment; but the public and folk messages can be read as alternatives in the language of the anthology in its final form. An analysis of the whole text identifies three main categories: verses which can be read only in the ascetic sense; verses which can be taken in this sense or equally in the public sense (directed to the state); and verses which can be taken in either the ascetic or the folk sense.

Which verse goes in which category is a matter of judgement, and there would be little point in a detailed tabulation of all verses. For what it is worth, though, the examination undertaken for this chapter counted only a minority of unambiguously ascetic verses that come in the first category – fifty-four, out of the 423. The public message can be read alongside the ascetic in many more – 115. What is most impressive, though, is the large number – 233 – which can be read on either the ascetic or the folk levels. (There are other permutations, which account for only a few verses.) The abundance of verses into which can be read a message for folk culture arises in large part because the many verses enjoining such qualities as detachment and calmness are also important as assurances to the local community that the wandering monk is totally neutral, and can be expected to exhibit wisdom and spiritual purity.

¹⁷ M. Douglas, Natural Symbols: explorations in cosmology (Penguin, Harmondsworth, 1973), p. 61.

The interplay of different ways of understanding a single verse can be illustrated by a single example drawn from the (very small) class of verses capable of being read on all three levels:

391 That one who does no ill in deed or word or thought, who is restrained in respect of these three – him do I call a brahmin.

The cultivation of restraint by cleaving to proper thought, proper speech and proper action is of course integral to the path followed by the wandering monk bent upon enlightenment. The ascetic message is plain enough. But so is the public: this verse asserts that the holy man, marked not by his birth or his training in officiating at rituals but by his supreme mental self-control, is the proper mediator between the community and the forces that bring about its weal or woe, and he is a paradigm of social virtue, fostering no dissidence or division. Meanwhile, the villager living on the fringes of Sanskrit civilization is reassured by the verse's popular message: unlike the official brahmins, with their pretensions and their exclusive customs, the monk is a truly benign figure, easy to approach yet powerful as an intercessor on account of his spiritual purity.

Certainly, Buddhist monks were of all sorts. But the ideals of detachment and spiritual purity were always prominent in the dhamma, and the training in calmness and dignity was integral to the discipline. Those monks who came at all close to embodying the recognized values of the Order were necessarily well placed to stand forth, not only as good role models for novices, but also as potential mediators between the culturally isolated locality and the cosmopolitan state. This point is easy enough to document in respect of the careers of forest monks in modern times. It is not so easy in respect of ancient times, with sources contaminated by centuries of historical evolution; but it is still possible to see how readily the protagonists of the middle path could slip into the role of middleman at a time of cultural dislocation.

The mediating role as shown in the Canon

This chapter examines the role of the monk as middleman in a domesticated, monastic environment, as reflected mostly in the Vinaya. Evidence is scanty, but a few passages identify specific kinds of mediation forbidden to monks. The tone of admonition indicates that what is forbidden must have been practised. A role as middleman is not the same as the mediatory role, but the negative aspects of it as laid down in the texts are deserving of attention because of the restrictions they would implicitly place on the mediatory role.

One significant example concerns the ubiquitous monk Udāyin, who is portrayed attempting to make a match linking two families, and is sitting down in a secluded place with the girl in question, a man, and a woman. A prominent woman in the area, Visākhā, found out about this. She came and spoke to Udāyin, saying: ‘Sir, this is not pleasing, it is not right, it is inappropriate for the master to sit with a woman – one man with one woman – on a secluded, comfortable seat. Although, sir, the master rightly has absolutely no ulterior motive, it is hard to convince people who are unconvinced.’¹ This uncompromisingly asserts that in certain respects monks were not to act as middlemen in local affairs and the example given is certainly of behaviour alien to the original ascetic ideal. Nevertheless, it must acknowledge a reality; a teaching transmitted down the centuries would not hold up such behaviour as a bad example unless it actually characterized some monks. The proscription is evidence of what it proscribes.

CONDITIONS LIMITING AND PROMOTING THE ROLE OF MONK AS MEDIATOR

In general, the monk was required to be modest in behaviour. One instance alleging the laity’s insistence on this is in a passage portraying monkish greed. King Bimbisāra offers the monks access to his mango grove, and they abuse his hospitality by taking far too many. Then:

¹ Vin III 187–8.

These people told the matter to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha. He said: 'Look! The masters have really enjoyed eating the mangoes, but the Lord has stressed moderation.' People . . . spread it about, saying: 'How is it that these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, will enjoy eating the king's mangoes because they do not know moderation?'

And so the Buddha initially prohibited them, but allowed their limited use in curries.² The discipline of moderation is imposed not only upon a monk's apprehension of all sense objects, but also in the garments he wears, the implements he carries and his behaviour inside or outside the monastery.

A difficult area here for the Order was the temptation to demonstrate psychic capacities, believed to be a by-product of advanced meditational accomplishments; it was considered threatening to the spirit of moderation. For example, a story tells of an expensive sandal-wood bowl made to the order of a wealthy merchant of Rājagaha. He had it placed at the top of a pole and offered it to anyone who could bring it down by psychic means. The so-called six heretical teachers tried and failed, then Piṇḍola the Bhāradvāja, a 'perfected one as well as of psychic power', rose up in the air and brought it down. The merchant gave it to the monk, filled with expensive food. Then:

People heard it said, 'The master Piṇḍola made the bowl of the merchant of Rājagaha come down.' Then these people, making a loud noise, followed very close behind the venerable Piṇḍola the Bhāradvāja. Then the Lord heard the great noise, and, after hearing it, said to the venerable Ānanda, 'What on earth, Ānanda, is this loud noise? . . . ' [The Buddha rebuked the monk:] 'It is not suitable, Bhāradvāja, it goes against the grain, it does not look right, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is inappropriate . . . Bhāradvāja, how could you reveal this extraordinary condition, this amazing psychic power, to householders, because of a miserable wooden bowl? . . .

Then he went on to prohibit such exhibitions in general and ordered that the bowl be broken up and made into ointment.³

No doubt men who appeared to demonstrate psychic powers provoked various reactions. Hindu narrative literature is full of the awe and fear evoked by ascetics who use their ascetic heat destructively, or for sexual adventures, and in contemporary Indian villages people believed to be possessed by a deity are often credited with much power.⁴ The same applies here: the monk who has psychic powers inspires fear, but also attraction. For the Order this was unacceptable for several reasons – because it violated the principle of moderation in all things, because the monk should not make a public show of himself, and because it was potentially expressive of sensuality. If the laity was impressed, it was for all the wrong reasons.

² Vin II 109. Cf. Vin IV 258–9. ³ Vin II 110–12.

Nonetheless, the display of psychic powers must have been very tempting; if nothing else, it would have attracted an audience of monks or potential supporters. Thus there was conflict between the Order's interest in attracting contributions and its fundamental principle of utter detachment, to which the public demonstration of psychic powers was repugnant.

Nor are the texts utterly consistent, for elsewhere the Buddha endorses householders' requests for the monks 'to look out for lucky signs. I allow you monks when being asked by householders for good luck's sake, to tread on a cloth carpeting.'⁵ Perhaps this could have been justified by the need for a monk to communicate his merit in whatever way he could, and need not be considered a demonstration of psychic power.

People who are seen as impartial and honest brokers are likely to be appealed to as mediators of any sort, and indeed monks are portrayed as honest brokers throughout the canon. It is one of the reasons why the Vinaya rules are so extensive and why there is so much emphasis placed on the monks' own and the laymen's disparagement of other monks who do not appear to act with the utmost probity. Honesty is not the most apposite word, for the monk is supposed to surpass all other men in his detachment from all material things. This perceived impartiality must have helped qualify him as a 'go-between', a kind of messenger between different groups, whose persuasive power was underpinned by his reputation as a monk. An additional factor in a monk's utility as a mediator must have been his knowledge of a relatively extensive region; this knowledge, enhanced by current news he picked up from other wandering monks, would have been much richer than that possessed by a typical villager.

Here is a negative example of this honesty taken from the Vinaya:

A certain caravan was desirous of going from Rājagaha to the south. A certain monk said this to the people belonging to the caravan: 'I will go with you venerable people.'

'But we, sir, will evade the customs tax.'

⁴ See K. Erndl, Victory to the Mother: the Hindu Goddess of Northwest India in Myth, Ritual and Symbol (Oxford University Press, New York, 1993), ch. 5.

⁵ Vin II 128.

The overseers heard about this, ransacked the caravan and asked the monk why he had travelled with a caravan which he knew was engaged in theft. Nonetheless, they set him free. Other monks found out and the Buddha rebuked him with the stock phrase, 'It is not, foolish man, to please those who are not pleased.'⁶

Another similar story tells of an honest monk to whom a woman attaches herself. Her husband assaults the monk, but later apologizes. The Buddha rebukes the monk, using the same terms as in the previous case.⁷

A final example: the nun Thullanandā takes into the Order a Licchavi adulteress whose husband wishes to kill her. The adulteress takes valuables belonging to him; he then complains to King Pasenadi. The Buddha thereupon prohibits the ordination of anyone in trouble with the law.⁸

If the monks' perceived honesty is a source of attraction for the laity, a danger for their mediatory role is the monks' constant vulnerability to accusations of being tainted with worldly attitudes and concerns. Caesar's wife must be above suspicion. One instance among many concerns the (probably apocryphal) 'group of six monks' who 'entered a village at the wrong time, sat down in a hall and talked a variety of worldly talk' on topics such as politics, clothes, household goods, town gossip, women and useless metaphysical speculation. Householders criticized them for this; the Buddha heard about it, and declared a general prohibition of entering villages at the wrong time. This criticism may have been made because the spiritual aspirations of monks require them to stand above worldly life, which they renounced at ordination. (But nuns such as Thullanandā do go to a village on business (karaṇīyena), though it is not clear what this business was.)⁹ On the other hand, it would have been difficult to function as mediators between different groups if they did not possess a good knowledge of affairs and if they could not move freely between different levels of society. Delicate balancing was required. The monk, to be of use to competing parties, needed to be familiar with rural problems; yet, by direct personal involvement in worldly affairs, he risked impairing his status as an impartial wise man. The monk placed himself firmly within a transcendent universal framework of values, much broader than the villagers' more narrowly directed aspirations and values.

Yet the frequent references to monks being supported by a particular family or householder in a given village indicate that they must have been provided with a good working knowledge of family problems and of the ⁶ Vin IV 131.

⁷ Vin IV 132ff.

⁸ Vin IV 225–6.

⁹ Vin IV 230–1.

difficulties of subsistence at both family¹⁰ and village level. The Buddha's admonitions may have been directed simply at preventing them from airing their knowledge casually or frivolously, without judiciousness or restraint. Consider a conflict of interest, where Sāriputta is potentially torn between breaking a Vinaya rule and offending the family which supports him:

The Lord stayed in Sāvattihī . . . at that time the family who supported the venerable Sāriputta sent a youth to the venerable Sāriputta, saying: 'May the elder let this youth go forth.' Then the venerable Sāriputta thought: 'A rule of training the Lord has designated says that one monk should not attend upon two novices and this Rāhula is my novice. Now what path of action should I follow? . . .' [The Buddha then promulgated a rule allowing an experienced monk to have two novices.]¹¹

TYPES OF MEDIATION

The texts, virtually our only evidence for the early history of the saṅgha, were compiled by selection and rearrangement over a long period to meet the purposes of edification and pedagogy in the interests of monastic and lay education in much later times. These purposes are remote from those of the modern social historian, and it is not surprising that, in presenting all their narrative material as generic object lessons or as ideals, the texts do not tell us the ways in which monks actually dealt with the public. We have to read between the lines. Generally, we can infer monks' actual behaviour only from what they are told not to do. The Vinaya does provide some instances suggestive of the monk's middleman role. In each case, an example of monkish activity is subsequently used by the Buddha to promulgate a particular rule of conduct. Many of the examples we have found are trivial enough in themselves, but their value is in drawing attention to the variety of ways in which, despite the detachment from worldly involvement professionally required of the wandering monk, the Buddha's followers were involved in lay affairs.

To count as mediation, a monk's action must involve two different parties who wish to communicate in order to achieve a particular goal unrelated to the monk himself; both regard him as an honest broker. Mediation is more than mere interaction, for monks inevitably had to interact with laity and non-Buddhists simply by undertaking an alms round. Nor can it be ¹⁰ Eg. Vin IV 178: ' . . . in Sāvattihī there was a certain family which became favourable towards the middle way and as it grew in faith, it decreased in wealth. Any solid food or soft food the family obtained they gave to monks before it was eaten and sometimes they went without food.'

¹¹ Vin I 83.

simply offering advice to interested parties. Into such categories would fall the sermons monks give to donors and, the most spectacular, advice that the Buddha is depicted giving to kings.

There are many cases of monks giving advice to laymen about dealings with the Order. One such is the monk Sudhamma,¹² who 'was a builder and resided in the Maccikāsaṇḍa of the householder Citta where he ate permanently (dhuvabhattiko).¹³ When Citta wished to invite an Order, a group or an individual person, he would not . . . [do so] before he had asked the venerable Sudhamma.' A problem emerges when Sudhamma thinks he alone can decide with which monks Citta will have relations. When several very prominent monks, including Sāriputta and Moggallāna, are invited by Citta for a meal, without first consulting Sudhamma, the latter becomes unhappy and begins criticizing the quality of the meal. The Buddha finds out what has happened and rebukes Sudhamma, saying,

It is not suitable, foolish man, it goes against the grain, it does not look right, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is inappropriate, it should not be done. How could you, foolish man, scold and jeer so contemptuously at the householder Citta, who has faith, who believes, who is a donor and supporter of the Order?¹⁴

Only in an oblique sense can this be taken as an example of mediation: Sudhamma is the conduit by which Citta, a prominent layman, is enabled to interact with other monks. Sudhamma assumes something approaching dominance over Citta. No doubt there was always a danger of this happening, given the awe in which certain monks were held – especially those credited with psychic powers. It may also signal the tensions arising when monks entered the territory of others and encroached on the families on whom the latter depended.

One type of mediation was that of matchmaker, a curious job for a monk given his supposed distance from matters of the heart. It may not represent mediation between different ethnic or political groups, but it is a sort of mediation between kin groups. Several such examples can be found in the Vinaya, usually involving the monk Udāyin:

. . . At Sāvattī in the Jeta grove in Anāthapiṇḍika's park . . . the venerable Udāyin was dependent (kulupago hoti) on families at Sāvattī, and he went up to many families. Whenever he saw a young boy without a wife and a young girl without a husband, he spoke of her beauty in the presence of the young boy's parents, saying: 'The young girl from that family is beautiful, good looking, pleasant, learned, wise, intelligent, capable and energetic. That young girl is right for that young boy.'

¹² Vin II 15ff.

¹³ There are some oddities with this passage. Why would a monk – the word here is not bhikkhu but āyasmā – work for a householder? In addition, dhuvabhattiko could also translate as 'permanent servant'.

¹⁴ Vin II 18.

They said: 'They don't know us, sir, neither who we are, nor to whom we belong. If, sir, the noble monk were to make them give, we would bring that young girl to this young boy.'

He spoke of the boy's handsomeness in the presence of the girl's parents, saying: 'The young boy of that family is handsome, good looking, pleasant, wise, intelligent, capable and energetic. That young boy is right for that young girl.'

They said: 'They don't know us, sir, neither who we are, nor to whom we belong, nor what is this young girl's property. If, sir, the noble monk were to make them ask, we might give this young girl to that young boy.'

In this way he caused bridegrooms to be led out, brides to be brought out, and so caused marriages to happen.¹⁵

What is significant here is that Udāyin is dealing – in a very sensitive area – with families with whom he has a relationship circumscribed by alms-giving. No doubt this has allowed them to build up confidence in him and his competence to negotiate. In addition, since neither family knows the other, yet he knows both, it appears that his circle of acquaintances was much wider than that of the laymen with whom he had dealings. Nor is he simply an informant. He has to make a case as well. Why would a monk want to do this? Was it because he felt an obligation for alms given to him by the families on whom he was dependent? Was the transfer of merit an insufficient inducement always to give food? That this form of mediation was not a single case is demonstrated by the tales directly following it which show similar efforts at matchmaking.

A more down-market version of this was the use of the monk in the act of communicating between potential marriage partners of substantially different status. Another anecdote dealing with Udāyin tells of disciples of the Ājīvikas, arriving from afar, who asked a former prostitute to give her daughter to their son.

She refused, saying, 'Sir, I don't know you, nor who these are, nor to whom he belongs; and I will not give my only daughter to go to a distant village.' [The disciples were then advised to approach Udāyin as he 'will make her give her daughter'. Udāyin did as requested, telling her to give her daughter as he knew them. To this she responded positively,]

'If, sir, the master knows them, I will give (her.)'

[She gave her daughter to the disciples of the Ājīvikas; however, they began treating her like a slave, and she sent a message of complaint to her mother, asking to be taken away. In response her mother went to see them and asked them not to mistreat her daughter, but they told her they would not deal with her, only with the monk (samaṇena saddhim ambhākam āhārūpahāro . . .). After a second letter of complaint the courtesan approached Udāyin, who subsequently asked the disciples not to mistreat the young girl. But now they said, shiftily,]

¹⁵ Vin III 135.

‘We do not want anything to do with you; we only want to deal with the courtesan. A recluse should have no occupation. A recluse should be a genuine recluse. You go away, we don’t know you.’

[A third message was sent, then the courtesan went directly to Udāyin who told her what had happened to him, and suggested she go herself. In response she cursed Udāyin to be miserable and unhappy and her young daughter put the same curse on him. After that, many other women who were unhappy with their in-laws denounced him, whilst others who were happy praised him, wishing prosperity for him.

Other monks saw what happened and the so-called modest monks asked,] ‘How can the venerable Udāyin act as a go-between?’ (katham hi nāma āyasmā udāyī samcarittam samāpajjissasi) [He became upset and complained to the Buddha. The Buddha condemned Udāyin with the words,] ‘Whatever monk should act as a go-between for a woman who wants a man or for a man who wants a woman, whether as a wife or as a mistress, that is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.¹⁶

This kind of activity does count as mediation. The monk is well acquainted with both parties involved in the exchange. Knowledge of the other party is essential here as the reason given for the courtesan’s reluctance to marry her daughter to the son of the Ājīvika is her lack of knowledge of them. The monk’s acquaintance with both parties indicates not just his wide local knowledge but also his acquaintance with people who live beyond the locality. Further, he is dealing with a rival sect, the Ājīvikas, thereby showing that the monk could operate between different status groups within society. This inference gains weight from the status difference of the two implicated categories of people: prostitutes, and lay Ājīvikas, a religious group conspicuous by its extreme behaviour in the Buddha’s time.

However, this mediatory function can go wrong. Ultimately the monk cannot compel the two parties to behave ethically. His own behaviour is carefully circumscribed by Vinaya rules, and that of Buddhist laypeople is ultimately defined by the Buddha’s five basic rules for lay followers. Yet lay moral observance is voluntary, nor should the Buddhist monk intervene to apply pressure in any way. This would compromise his status as a monk, an impartial figure, in the eyes of those with whom he is dealing. Hence the critique of him made by the Ājīvikas. This is more than opportunism; it is a genuine indictment that Udāyin has stepped beyond his legitimate sphere.

¹⁶ Summary of Vin III 135–8.

The cursing and blessing by the women of the town constitute a more broad-based and potentially devastating indictment. Not only does it present the monk as having a divisive influence on the layfolk of the village, but it also epitomizes the sort of unprofitable states that are so condemned in early Buddhist literature. Life in the world is all dukkha, and any activity within society, even activity directed towards satisfaction of legitimate wants, whilst it may have provisional value, is ultimately a valueless tinkering with concerns that should have been abandoned by one on the path of the dhamma. Such activity was therefore a potential trap for a monk.

This narrative is followed by another of a similar kind where the persons requiring the 'go-between' are a prostitute and a group of men seeking to have sexual intercourse with her. Some of the dialogue is illuminating for the light it throws on Udāyin's role. The men sent a messenger to bring her but she refused to go with him:

She said, 'Masters, I don't know you, nor who you are, nor to whom you belong; and I have many possessions and resources, but I will not go outside the city.' . . .

[A man said,] 'Sir, why are you soliciting this prostitute? Surely master Udāyin should be told. Master Udāyin will bring (uyyojessati) her here.'

When he had said this, a certain layman said to that man: 'Do not say that, master; it is not right for recluses, sons of the Sakyans, to act like that. Master Udāyin will not do it.'

When he had said this, they said, 'Will he do it, or won't he do it?' and they made a bet.

Then these dissolutes approached the venerable Udāyin . . .

Udāyin went and asked the prostitute to go to the men. She agreed, saying, 'If, sir, the master knows them, I will go.'

[A layman complained about a monk acting as a 'go-between' for a 'temporary wife' (taṃ khaṇikaṃ sañcarittaṃ sampajjisatīti) and the Buddha declared the activity to be a saṅghādiseso offence.]¹⁷

The same themes are present as in the previous example, and this is presumably why they were all grouped together as saṅghādisesa rules. In both examples the crucial words are sañcarittaṃ sampajjisati, where the latter word can occur in several variant forms. Deriving from sam/car, the noun saṃcarittar conveys the idea of wandering about, though in the few examples where it occurs (almost all restricted to this section of the Vinaya) the prefix sam could have a sociative sense as well as indicating the act of moving between different parties. The repetition of the prefix sam in both words gives emphasis to the concept of intermediation.

¹⁷ Vin III 138–9.

Does this episode describe anything more than an act of procurement? Certainly a lay follower has considerable doubts about the integrity of a monk persuading a prostitute to go with men of whom she has no knowledge at all. Yet she trusts him. All these examples share this theme. The monk is approachable because of his knowledge and honesty. But is the monk truly neutral? If the lay follower could doubt his neutrality, perhaps the Buddha himself would have doubted it.

Often the Buddha is depicted dealing with prostitutes, so it is arguable that the monk Udāyin was simply helping her in her specific occupation, that truly he was acting as a 'go-between' without making any moral judgement on those for whom he was acting. However, as always in dealing with the laity, the Buddhist Order needed to heed its perceptions, and lay opinion had always to be accommodated. So if the monk was to act as mediator in the specific examples just cited he would do so only within defined boundaries.

Perhaps, therefore, the Vinaya's attribution to the Buddha of acute sensitivity towards monks demonstrating bad conduct is, in a way, good evidence that in principle monks were qualified to play the mediatory role.

An extreme example concerns the followers of the monks Assaji and Punabbasu, located at Kiṭāgiri, who have to be reprimanded because of the many forms of outrageous behaviour they engage in.¹⁸ According to the text, what concerns the Buddha is that 'their evil conduct is seen and also heard, and respectable families corrupted by them are seen and also heard'. In the course of this the Buddha lays down the right conduct for monks living in a state of material dependency on particular families:

If a monk who lives in dependence on some village or small town corrupts families and does evil, and if his evil activities are seen and heard about and families he had corrupted are seen and heard about, the monks [as advised by the Buddha] should speak to him in this way, 'The venerable monk must depart from this residence where he has lived long enough.'¹⁹

It is not just the conduct itself which is condemned. Rather, the cumulative effect leads to an evil reputation being spread abroad, one capable of detriment to the Order in every area of its operation.

¹⁸ Vin III 179ff.; Vin II 13–17.

¹⁹ Vin III 184. Note the commentary upon this: "Families corrupted by him" means that formerly having acquired faith, they no longer have faith because of him. Having been convinced, they are no longer convinced.'

MONK AS RECONCILER

None of the examples just cited could be described as fulfilling a mediatory role in the sense in which a wandering ascetic might do. Cumulatively, however, they do show the monk as capable of acting as a neutral channel for communication between groups who are engaged effectively in some form of exchange, not necessarily involving money. What is being exchanged is women, and it may simply be a logical extension of the monk's professed chastity that (perhaps like eunuchs in Chinese imperial harems) he is chosen for this task. A different kind of mediatory task, though, involves the monk in reconciliation. For example:

Once, a certain woman, having quarrelled with her husband, went to her mother's house.

A monk dependent on her family effected a reconciliation. He was 'remorseful . . . so this was not considered an offence'.²⁰ Yet, when on the next page of the same text a monk acts as a go-between for a eunuch, that is branded an offence. Both instances refer to situations involving family and possibly sexuality. Yet again it is the monk's chastity and his capacity to draw upon local knowledge of people that are brought into play, giving him a special status as reconciler.

The story of Pilinda, as told in the Mahāvagga, depicts the monk as reconciler, but also presents the potential dangers of conflict of interest that can beset a monk as mediator. Here is a summary of the passage:

Pilinda was a monk who wished to make a cave, so had a mountain slope cleared in Rājagaha. King Bimbisāra went up to him and offered an attendant for a monastery, but this was refused because the Buddha would not allow it. Pilinda agreed to ask the Buddha if it was acceptable and then gave the king a talk on dhamma. On being asked the Buddha agreed to a request for an attendant, and Bimbisāra came up and made the offer again. This time it was accepted, but he forgot to give the order and did not do so until after five hundred days. In consequence of the passing of five hundred days his chief minister gave five hundred attendants to the monk.

They established a village and Pilinda used it for his alms collection. One day the villagers held a festival where the young girls were decked out with ornaments. One young girl did not have any and cried. The monk Pilinda asked the girl's mother why the girl was crying. When told the reason, he had the girl's mother put a roll of grass on her head, and through his psychic power had this changed into gold. Bimbisāra heard about it, believed the family had stolen the gold, and so had them jailed.

²⁰ Vin III 144.

Pilinda found out what had happened, went to see Bimbisāra, and, exercising 'volitional force', had the king's palace turned into gold. In response Bimbisāra released the family. Pilinda became famous and was given ghee, fresh butter, oil, honey and molasses by the laity. He acquired so much it began to overflow and the people complained that he was storing up things, like the king. Other monks accused the monks associated with Pilinda of storing up abundance and the Buddha laid down a rule allowing only seven days' storage.²¹

Pilinda already has high status as a monk in the eyes of the king, a status seemingly enhanced by his knowledge of dhamma. From the village he receives all kinds of offerings of food. His close relation with the king allows him to intercede when the king inadvertently causes injustice. His entitlement stems specifically from his status as a monk, not his individual qualities such as chastity and honesty. But presumably also his outsider status is important. Finally, this passage shows the monk bringing some kind of arrangement between two parties which exist in a relation of asymmetrical power.

Whether we can generalize from this example to the entire saṅgha is a moot point. The evidence does not show conclusively whether village elites respected monks simply because they were monks, or whether monks first had to display psychic powers or knowledge of the dhamma.

Another example of possible mediation concerns a monk being used by a layman to determine who is worthy of an inheritance:

At one time in Vesālī, the householder who was the supporter of the venerable Ajjuka had two children, a son and a nephew. Then the householder said this to the venerable Ajjuka: 'Sir, will you grant an audience to whichever of these two children has faith and conviction?' At that time the householder's nephew had faith and conviction. So the venerable Ajjuka granted an audience to that child. With his wealth, he set up an estate and made a gift. Then the householder's son said to the venerable Ānanda:

'Ānanda, sir, which is the father's heir, the son or the nephew?'

'The son, friend, is the father's heir.'

'Sir, this master Ajjuka has shown that our wealth belongs to our associate. Your reverence, the venerable Ajjuka is not a (true) recluse.'²²

Here it seems a monk is credited with influencing somebody as to who should receive an inheritance. Upāli declared no offence was accrued. This is surely not just an instance of a monk being appealed to on the score of his honesty. It must reflect the layman's belief that just as a monk has abandoned sexuality, so too has he abandoned material or any other wealth. Therefore his attitude in matters regarding wealth should be wholly detached and impartial. Here we see a figure committed to transcendent values being able to offer impartial adjudication between interested parties. In theory, this is the minimum condition for one who would play a mediatory role.

²¹ Summary of Vin I 207–9.

²² Vin III 66.

A related example concerns a monk being used by a trader:

Once, a certain man took a valuable jewel and went along the main road in the company of a certain monk. Then the man saw the customs house, put the jewel into the monk's wallet without him knowing it, and so took it past the customs house.²³

The Buddha declares this was not an offence since the monk had no awareness of it. Precisely because the monk is regarded as belonging to a special category to which the rules appropriate for normal laypeople do not apply, he can be used for fraudulent purposes. No wonder the Vinaya rules are at such great pains to preserve the public impression of the monk's indifference to material possessions and sensuality.

Further on in the same book of the Vinaya, there is a whole series of brief passages where women beseech monks to provide preparations either to prevent barrenness or to produce an abortion.

Once, a certain woman whose husband was living away from home became pregnant by a lover. She said to a monk, who was dependent for alms on her family, 'Look here, master, you must know of an abortive preparation.'

'All right, sister,' he said, and he gave her an abortive preparation. The child died. He was remorseful . . . 'You, monk, have fallen into an offence involving defeat,' he said.²⁴

In all of these examples the monk is said to be 'dependent for alms on her family'. He is credited with local knowledge, as well as either medical skill or sufficient knowledge to be able to find somebody else with it.

Another case relates once more to the monk's medical role:

Once, a certain man whose hands and feet had been cut off was in the paternal home surrounded by relations. A certain monk said to these people, 'People, do you want him to die?'

'Certainly, sir, we want that,' they said.

'Then you should make him drink buttermilk,' he said. They made him drink buttermilk, and he died. He was remorseful . . .²⁵

Nonetheless, this was regarded as a parājika offence.

²³ Vin III 62. ²⁴ Vin III 83; cf. Vin III 139. ²⁵ Vin III 86.

Here is a final example which, strictly, does not count as showing a monk as a mediator, but it is interestingly suggestive. The monks go to spend the rains at Vaggumudā. Then Vajjī was short of alms-food and it could be obtained only with difficulty. It was white with bones and people were living by digging out little pieces of grain from holes in the ground using sticks. Nor was it easy to nourish oneself by gleanings or from kindness. . . . [The monks then proposed they would superintend the householders' business and execute householders' commissions.] Those who rejected superintending the work of householders said, 'We've had enough, your reverences, of overseeing the business of householders. Look, your reverences, we will take the householders' messages (. . . mayaṃ āvuso gihīnaṃ kammantaṃ adhiṭṭhitena . . . handa maya āvuso gihīnaṃ dūteyyaṃ harāma . . .) . . . thus they will think of giving to us; thus being entirely on friendly terms and not disputing, we will spend a comfortable rainy season and will not go short of alms-food.'

[Others suggested they praise the supernatural powers of certain monks. In this they succeeded. The monks were well fed, the people went hungry. The Buddha subsequently criticized them.]²⁶

If there is a problem here it is that monks definitely seem to be acting like householders. Rather than mediation, their job of running messages is something anybody employed by the householder would be able to do. In addition, they are working for the sake of shelter and alms-food, commodities they would normally receive from begging. By undertaking a householder's task and doing it for a specific goal they forsake their positions as monks. The misdemeanour may be minor, but it shows how monks may compromise themselves by acting as mediators or involving themselves in the affairs of different social and occupational groupings.

In describing the monk as a mediator between various elements of society and levels of power, as an unappointed functionary made attractive because of his detachment and his rich knowledge of local (and perhaps regional) affairs, we need to be very careful not just to focus on the figure of the Buddha himself. The need for this caveat has already been signalled here. If the application of Brown's theory is to be valid in the Indian case, then we should expect that some of the monks initially dedicated to meditation and solitude should be gradually sucked into a degree of social involvement by the expectations of the laity, and that many of the less dedicated ordinary monks should readily and willingly take on socially active roles. Because of this, we have cited as many examples as practicable of instances where monks are dealing with people of demonstrably different social groups, occupations and political status. However banal, these examples do reveal the qualities laypeople expected of monks as middlemen between conflicting groups – local knowledge, chastity and indifference to the material world. The latter two qualities contributed to the high trust in which laypeople must have held the saṅgha as a special body of men and women standing always in an ambiguous position: in the world whilst outside of it.

²⁶ Vin III 87-91.

THE CONTRASTING MEDIATORY ROLE OF THE BRAHMINS

If one set of role model contrasts in Buddhist literature turns on the distinction between monks and laymen, another is between brahmin and monk. It was suggested in chapter 7 that monks had a role to play as middlemen between the urban culture of state capitals and the folk culture of outlying communities where the cultural gap between the two was great, while brahmins did the same where the cultural gap was small – at least, the outlying communities could recognize themselves in the world view offered by the brahmins. The contexts did not differ radically – there was necessarily a substantial overlap. This situation, we might naturally infer, provoked tension between brahmins and monks. In a sense they were competitors.

The difference between the role of the holy man or śramaṇa and that of the brahmin lies in the different settings in which they could operate successfully. Both moved between the seat of political and economic power and the communities upon which this power was encroaching, interpreting each to the other and representing (without necessarily possessing) education and high culture in the village.

It is therefore useful to notice how the process can be illustrated from the better-attested later history – derived mainly from epigraphic sources – when brahmins were acting as go-betweens mediating high culture, professing universal values, to the Little Tradition in communities already possessing, or valuing, some elements of the core traditions represented by brāhmaṇical culture. Here the brahmin could find the materials to co-opt local cults and myths, identifying regional deities as forms of great gods known to the Great Tradition. Note though that we are not arguing for a sharp distinction between a Great and a Little Tradition. The cultural ambassadors for the Great Tradition could operate successfully within the localized traditions only because they were immersed in both.

Such processes of acculturation are known to history, offering valuable examples of the middleman process by which brahmins assisted in the acculturation of people who derived their identity from a localized culture. Two scholars in particular have chronicled the role of the brahmin as a cultural mediator in different areas. Hermann Kulke, in his important book on the political role of the Jagannātha Cult in the history of Orissa, has given a significant lead, successfully demonstrating the role played by brahmins as agents in the spread of brāhmaṇical (and ḷṣatriya) culture to areas where it had not previously been authoritative. Kulke gives much attention to the need for Hindu kings and rājas, who colonized the coastal areas of Orissa, to domesticate the tribal people of the mountainous areas, where they were a potential threat to the agricultural expansion of the new growing Hindu kingdoms. Kulke shows that a community's pre-existing beliefs could be integrated into the brāhmaṇical tradition so as to allow the community to become integrated into a larger political unity with shared trans-local beliefs.²⁷

Even when the empire supposedly extended over a large area there was always doubt whether many of the subordinate tribes were, in fact, subordinate at all. In Samudragupta's time, '[t]he lords quite frequently proclaimed hugely successful expeditionary conquests in their inscriptions; however, rarely did they succeed in permanently connecting the subjugated princedoms with their own area of rule'.²⁸ Accompanying these conquests was a process of ideological conversion alluded to in the previous paragraph. This functioned like a process of domestication where the so-called 'barbarian tribes' came to pay obeisance to the larger state rulers and integrated themselves, to varying degrees, into the trans-local world view. In this process the brahmins played a vital part, and we are convinced this role was not a new one for them, that it had been played out well before the time of the explicit evidence provided in Orissan inscriptions. Kulke sets out the main lines of this process:

The consolidation of the princes' power in the new core regions was a protracted process . . . Even if the relations between Hindu society and the tribes were certainly never without tensions, it can however be confirmed that they were characterized in Orissa by a continual process of indoctrination and partial integration rather than by a constant suppression or complete destruction of tribes. In this context the brahmins played an exceedingly important normative role in Orissa. They defined and codified the obligations of tribes, which (as in the Mahābhārata) 'resided in the area of (Aryan) kings' . . . This was one of the most important duties of those brahmins who lived in the outer parts of the core region: to propagate this ideal of a domesticated tribe for their own welfare and that of their king.²⁹

²⁷ H. Kulke, Jagannātha-Kult, p. 8. See also Burton Stein, 'Formation of the medieval agrarian order: brahman and peasant in early South Indian history,' in Peasant, State and Society in Medieval South India (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1980/1994), pp. 63–89, writing about the Coromandel Plain from the sixth to tenth centuries ACE.

²⁸ Kulke, Jagannātha-Kult, p. 11. ²⁹ Ibid., p. 17.

This occurred by integrating tribes into the lower levels of the caste system and by pressing many of their menfolk into the army. But note: 'Both routes for the assimilation of tribesmen into the Hindu society led to a powerful mutual influence, a development which is generally known as "Hinduization".'³⁰ 'Hinduization', or, perhaps better, 'Indianization', is a process which extended to South East Asia, where the interactions which furthered it are a field open to speculation.³¹ In the further extension of Indian religions over later centuries, no doubt, brahmins could play ascetic roles, and Buddhist monks could play priestly roles (as they do in many places today). But in India, as in South-East Asia, the textual sources do not offer us historical records of the very earliest forms taken by the spread and encroachment of the culture of urban states among alien populations, except to the extent that stories of the Buddha may offer us distorted echoes. In the nature of his role as an outsider, a social blank, the wandering ascetic seeks to leave no footprints. The priestly figures who came later, acting as mediators among populations already to some extent culturally assimilated, are much easier to recognize.

³⁰ Ibid., p. 18.

³¹ See H. Kulke, 'Indian colonies, Indianization or cultural convergence?', in H. Schulte Nordholt, (ed), Onderzoek in Zuidoost Azië (Rijksuniversiteit de Leiden, Leiden, 1990), pp. 8–32. Alternatively, we could call the process 'Sanskritization'. M. N. Srinivas' concept has been much debated and the debate cannot be explored here, but the use of cultural themes from the religion of the Great Tradition to integrate a community into an embracing metropolitan culture must have important parallels in the more ancient, undocumented, processes of political expansion.

Exchange

As soon as he had made the decision to convert followers to the homeless life, the Buddha, as the first leader of the saṅgha, had to establish means of raising material support to sustain the saṅgha, none of whose members engaged in any productive work. This effort required at least three sustaining factors:

- (1) The presence of sufficient material support – whether from an economic surplus or elsewhere.
- (2) The intellectual motivation for people to give this support, a motivation fully acceptable to the laity, as to why they should give freely to the Order or to individual holy men.
- (3) A marketing or communicative technique designed to spread news of the saṅgha's need for support without giving the impression this need was motivated by avarice or grasping.

His success in harnessing material support can be judged by the minimal evidence in the texts pertaining to the development of these ideas. Even in the Buddha's time there must have been a widespread belief that śramaṇas were entitled to receive offerings and that benefits would flow directly from the giving of such offerings. How long it took to make the transition from individual to institution as receiver of gifts cannot be determined from the evidence at hand. From a quantitative perspective the difference is a fundamental one.

The offering of alms to monks looking for food in the early morning was the most habitual and conspicuous form of giving a layperson could make, at least when the saṅgha was first established. For the more wealthy the option was to offer land for a monastery, money or large quantities of food. Several centuries after the establishment of Buddhism, when it was successful in attracting many converts, it is clear from a study of inscriptions that even the less wealthy in society were offering financial donations for the construction of monuments. However, what becomes very apparent from studying the Pāli texts is that even in the earliest period of Buddhism the exchange of food during a meal had acquired other symbolic resonances simply than functioning as a glorified form of alms-giving. But the meals in question are not normal meals. They are characterized by their large size and strong ritualistic ambience. One could be forgiven for assuming they are almost entirely demonstrative, as if they are serving a kind of sumptuary consumption role. In studying these meals, therefore, we are studying a specific system of exchange, sumptuary consumption, systems of hierarchy within a clear Buddhist context and the Buddha's public dealings with elite members of society.

Most of the texts taken to illustrate the themes in this chapter are from the Vinaya and the Majjhima Nikāya. We have treated them from the perspective that they encode a set of values and are not just a careful description of specific historical events. At the same time we do not doubt that something like the meals described here did occur.

MERIT-MAKING

Given that the doctrine of the transfer of merit functions as one of the principal frames for gift exchange throughout Buddhist history and is a central frame in defining lay–monk relations we must say something about it before going on to the more specific case of what we call the ritual meal. So much has already been written on this subject that it is hardly necessary to enter into any detail. Ivan Strenski has summarized as well as anybody the interrelationships implied by the transference of merit:

... a domesticated saṅgha will, second, maintain a range of ritual relations with the lay communities outside it. Above all, the saṅgha is a ritual receiver of gifts. Weber even argued that the only real rule laid upon the Buddhist laity was the obligation to maintain the saṅgha by giving it gifts. This in turn leads to the first of the saṅgha's two chief symbolic relations with the lay world: the saṅgha is the chief occasion for merit-making (only superficially 'given' by the saṅgha for gifts received), thus making the saṅgha the chief exemplar of non-reciprocity. It is a passive symbol of independence even as it depends upon active lay donors (dāyakas). In this passive symbolic role, the saṅgha also exemplifies (and, of course, actively pursues) the dhamma and beyond this, Nibbāna itself. In an active role, the saṅgha provides preachers, teachers, scholars and, in certain cases, healers. Note well however, that none of these services is, strictly speaking, reciprocated cleanly to the laity for gifts given, but is an obligation, to some extent, freely assumed as appropriate to the new domesticated role of the saṅgha and its members. I shall argue that these relations constitute the basis of what is properly called a Buddhist culture or civilisation, and that they are in some sense the critical features of a domesticated saṅgha.¹

¹ Ivan Strenski, 'On generalized exchange and the domestication of the sangha', MAN, ns.18 (1983), p. 465.

And further:

In each case, we have a circle of giving beginning with the lay dāyaka, passing to the saṅgha, then from the saṅgha to other recipients, and ultimately, it can be argued, either in this or the next life to the initial giver. Thus the saṅgha does not necessarily reciprocate to the dāyaka for gifts given (least of all merit!) but instead acts to benefit a third party, which in turn eventually brings benefit back to the original donor. In some cases, where a 'trickle down' effect might occur, people would enjoy the same economic benefits and profitable estate would provide to the community at large . . . Rather than considering merit-making and the so-called transfer of merit a matter of spiritual accounting, we have something quite different: a dāyaka gives dāna to the saṅgha and thereby (automatically) earns merit (remembering all the while that this is not given the dāyaka by the saṅgha, only 'occasioned' by it); in turn the saṅgha then invites the dāyaka to invite others (the dead, the gods) to rejoice in the merit earned. The saṅgha gives an occasion for others to rejoice in the merit made by the first gift, and thus gain merit thereby.²

Whilst the idea of merit-making might presuppose a surplus, it is not dependent on a natural surplus of production over subsistence level of living, whatever that might have been. It would have occurred whether this kind of surplus prevailed or not. Merit was the reward for the deposition of goods and services with monks and was one way a surplus could both be used and justified. But the use of a surplus, individual or institutional, may have been popular because like the śrauta sacrifice it too had benefits over and above what might have accrued to the individual taking or giving the alms. In this we can agree with the judgement of the Ernfors: 'This contribution [derived from a surplus] is utilized for public works, which need not be physical and are typically ceremonial in nature, or concern the building of holy palaces, stupas or whatever of that kind. These things serve auspiciousness and maintenance of good life and order, enjoyed by all.'³

The centrality of the theory of the transference of merit guaranteed that aspects of it would be carefully defined in the texts. We cite two instances of such definitions to indicate the presentation of ideal types of monks as alms-receivers and of those who have fallen away from this ideal.

[At Sāvattḥī:]

What do you think of this monks! What kind of monk is worthy to approach a family and what kind of monk is unworthy to approach a family?

Indeed, monks, a monk may approach families thinking, 'They must give to me. They should not refuse to give. They must give a lot, not a little. They must give me excellent things only, not poor things. They must give to me quickly, not slowly. They must give to me respectfully, not disrespectfully.’ When they do not give anything to that monk who thinks like this, he feels annoyed because of that and consequently experiences pain and sorrow. And he feels like this if they give a little and not a lot, and if they give what is poor and not excellent, and if they give slowly and not quickly. The monk is annoyed by that and consequently experiences pain and sorrow. They give without respect, not respectfully. The monk is annoyed by that and consequently experiences pain and sorrow.

² Ibid., pp. 473–4.

³ E. B. Ernfors and R. F. Ernfors, Archaic Economy and Modern Society (Studia Sociologica Upsaliensia 31, Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, Uppsala, 1990), p. 148.

Monks, this kind of monk is not worthy to approach a family.

But indeed, monks, a monk may approach families thinking, ‘How could I possibly think in regard to other families that “they must give to me. They should not refuse to give. They must give a lot to me, not a little. They must give me excellent things only, not poor things. They must give to me quickly, not slowly. They must give to me respectfully, not disrespectfully.”’ The monk is not annoyed by that and consequently he does not experience pain and sorrow.

Monks, this kind of monk is worthy to approach a family.⁴

The second passage seems to propose a historical change in the status of the monk, the Buddha lamenting the passing from the forest dwelling monk to the dweller in a monastery.

‘Lord it is difficult to speak right now to the monks since they are full of qualities arising from wrong advice, they are impatient and do not respond quickly when taught.’

‘In the past, Kassapa, the elder monks were forest dwellers and praised the forest life; they ate only alms-food and praised living off alms-food; they wore rags from a dust heap; they wore three robes and praised the wearing of three robes; they desired little and praised the attitude of desiring little; they were wholly satisfied and praised the attitude of being wholly satisfied; they were secluded and praised seclusion; they did not mix and praised lack of contact; they were energetic and praised the application of energy . . .

. . . Then the senior monks invited the monk – who was a forest dweller and praised the forest life – to a seat, saying, “Come monk! What is your name, monk! This monk is certainly of high repute. This monk definitely wants to learn. Come monk, sit on this seat!” . . .

But now the senior monks are not forest dwellers and do not praise the forest life; they do not simply eat alms-food and do not praise living off alms-food; they do not wear rags from a dust heap and do not praise the wearing of rags from a dust heap; they do not simply wear three robes and do not praise the wearing of only three robes; they do not desire just a little and do not praise the attitude of desiring just a little; they were not wholly satisfied; they were not secluded and did not praise seclusion; they mixed and did not praise lack of contact; they were not energetic and did not praise the application of energy.

⁴ S II 199–200.

There is a monk who is well-known, renowned, who receives gifts of clothes, alms, lodgings and all the requisites and medicines for illness; it is he the senior monks invite to a seat, saying, "Come monk! What is your name, monk? This monk is certainly of high repute! This monk certainly wants to be with other ascetics. Come monk, sit on this seat!"⁵

It would be possible to see the last paragraph of this passage as an admission of the elite nature of the early saṅgha; what had originally hoped to produce a community dedicated to an ideal succeeded only, under the influence of patronage for the wrong reasons, in providing a career path for the sort of politically adept monk who, in modern society, would be good at getting his face on television and making friends with the rich and famous. Perhaps the real burden of both these passages is the obvious one: that there will always be a temptation for a monk to spruik for alms, or if not, to use with more subtlety his reputation as a monk as a specific means of acquiring alms. This would represent a misunderstanding of the merit-making relationship, for, as Strenski says, it is as much about an opportunity for the laity to obtain merit as it is for the saṅgha to receive material support.

We must assume the simplest form of alms-giving and alms-seeking was a highly ritualized demonstration of one form of exchange between laity and monk. Yet this form of exchange, scarcely a 'gift exchange', was not one taking in the idea of contract and reciprocity. On the surface the gift of food in return for a sermon might conjure up the idea of a relation of reciprocity, which is what we find underlying the Hindu notion of sacrifice. The problem with the Hindu model is that it would have tied the monk into a form of obligation to the donor – almost a form of attachment in the Buddhist reading of it. Nevertheless the Hindu model of obligation to provide hospitality to guests must have been one of the dominant ones known within the cultures inhabited by the Buddha and his followers, even if the model was not formalized until several centuries later in the Dharmaśāstras. As Jamison⁶ has stressed in a recent book, the situation described in Hindu texts from the Brāhmaṇas to the Dharmaśāstras is one where a guest must be received and hospitality given, irrespective of the giver's inclination or his material circumstances. From the Buddhist point of view the bhikkhu is not an atithi (guest) and, whilst the lay Buddhist does have an implicit obligation⁷ to feed the monk, for the Hinduized layperson no such obligation need exist in theory. In practice, of course, the situation might have been considerably different and the success of monks' begging for food might have been a consequence of the dominance in northeastern India of the Hindu model of hospitality.

⁵ S II 208.

⁶ S. W. Jamison, Sacrificed Wife. Sacrificer's Wife (Oxford University Press, New York, 1996), pp. 153–69. Cf. also F. Wilhelm, 'Hospitality and the caste system', Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik, 20 (1996), pp. 523–9; T. Brekke, 'Contradiction and the merit of giving in Indian religions', Numen, 45 (1998), pp. 303–8 for the view of giving as sacrifice.

But what does this tell us about non-monastic economics and the role of the saṅgha in the early Indian economy? We should at this stage note that this was not just a barter arrangement where food and materials would be provided to a monk who was held to be a field of merit. No bargaining would ever take place. In the Buddha's time, and certainly in contemporary Buddhist countries, the exchange becomes impersonalized when money intervenes, though the merit component is certainly still present. However, it is our conviction that the meal functioned as a form of gift exchange, where reciprocity was certainly implied. In this sense it brings with it all the qualities associated with the gift in what the Ernfors describe as archaic societies:

The gift is a sign of the norm, the obligation or duty and right, and as such a carrier of a normative order of various widths and scopes. Being presented, it demands a return, whether this be in the form of a material thing, behaviour, gesture of the body or mind or whatever. And this return is a gift as well, whether it be called 'service', 'favour', 'duty' or a 'gift'. The gift in its archaic context is the beginning and the end of essential social activity, the realization of the norm and its initiation. It commands a cycle of duties and right . . .⁸

The subsequent part of this chapter attempts to unpack this statement as it applies to the meal understood as gift.

THE IMPORTANCE OF MEALS AS A MEASURE OF SOCIAL INTERACTION

The image of the monk as an almsman (and the doctrine of the transfer of merit used to circumscribe the mode of exchange) is such a familiar one in Buddhist literature as to be taken for granted as the privileged image of exchange between monk and laity in early Buddhism. It is not the only such image, however. Another one, also occurring frequently in the texts, is structured around a meal between the Buddha or another monk and a layman. It is normal in such cases for the meal to be enframed within ⁷ Though the obligation to accept may not have been equally stringent. See Brekke, 'Contradiction', p. 298.

⁸ Ernors and Enfors, Archaic Economy, pp. 59–60; emphasis in the original.

the larger context of conversion, a common frame in Buddhist literature and not always including the kind of meal with which we are concerned here. All the meals presented in such cases are large, highly demonstrative and deliberately ritualized, offering possibilities for sumptuary display on the part of the patron who pays for the meal and an exalted status for the Buddha who receives it. It may be problematic that the great majority of cases of meal narratives portray the Buddha as the recipient of the meal and so, to be fully conclusive, evidence of other monks receiving the kind of adulation implied by the meal should be found, so that it is not exclusively a marker of the Buddha's own charisma.⁹

A passage taken from the Jīvakasutta of the M lays down some of the conditions under which a monk is approached by a layperson for a meal and the required attitudes that should prevail in the monk. It also demonstrates, we think, that the prior invitation to a meal distinguishes it from the typical alms-gathering round the monk is ideally supposed to take each morning.

. . . Jivaka, a monk lives in reliance on a village or market town. He lives having suffused the first quarter with a mind of friendliness, likewise the second, likewise the third, likewise the fourth; just so above, below, across; he lives having suffused the whole world everywhere, in every way, with a mind of friendliness that is far-reaching, wide-spread, immeasurable, without enmity, without any ill-will. A householder, or a householder's son who has gone to him, invites him for a meal on the next day. If he wants to, the monk accepts, Jivaka. When the night has passed, he dresses in the early morning, takes his bowl and robe, and approaches the dwelling of that householder or householder's son. Once he has gone there he sits down on the appointed seat, and the householder or householder's son waits on him with sumptuous alms-food. The thought does not occur to him: 'It's really good that a householder or a householder's son waits on me with similar kinds of sumptuous alms-food. A householder or a householder's son should wait on me in the future with sumptuous alms-food of the same kind'. This does not occur to him. He enjoys that alms-food without being ensnared, infatuated or enthralled by it, but seeing the danger in it, aware of the outcome . . .¹⁰

Even in defining normative attitudes, this text itself notes the particular specificity of this kind of meal: it is sumptuous. Hence our suggestion that this meal is in considerable measure an opportunity for sumptuous display on the part of the wealthy. But if the attitude of the monk is to be one of absolute indifference, identical with what is required in the more habitual kind of alms round, the text tells us nothing of the attitude of the donor. As we will see this is often characterized by competitive zeal.

⁹ See S IV 288ff., where Citta offers a meal to the 'elder monks'. This is elaborated in ch. 10 above.

¹⁰ MI 368ff.

A question that arises here, of course, is how the Buddha and the Order's acceptance of these fabulous sumptuary meals fitted with their commitment to poverty and absence of ostentation.

Whatever the answer, the evident tension between the ideal of spartan simplicity and the practice of lavish honour is a reminder that, in the process of the growth of Buddhism, there had to be different Buddhisms. Add to this the likelihood that the practice of devotees surrounding renouncers with great wealth was becoming increasingly common in India during the Buddha's time, then to the extent that Buddhism became part of society, it was inevitably going to adapt, acquiring a multiple personality as it did so.

A classic instance of the meal as ritual of exchange, with all the signification of hierarchy and transformation this implies, is recorded in the Abhayarājakumārasutta:

[The Buddha was staying near Rājagaha. Prince Abhaya went up to Nātaputta, a Jain monk. Nātaputta tried to persuade Prince Abhaya (son of King Bimbisāra) to defeat the Buddha – who, he said, was 'of such great psychic power' – in argument as this would give him much fame (te kalyāṇo kittisaddo). Abhaya agreed and Nātaputta presented him with a dilemma to put to the Buddha, one designed to make the Buddha say something disagreeable to someone.] . . . and (p. 61) Abhaya 'answered Nātaputta the Jain in assent, rose from his seat, greeted Nātaputta the Jain keeping his right side towards him, went up to the Lord; and when he had arrived there he greeted the Lord and sat down at a respectful distance'.

He thought, 'It is not the right time today to refute the Lord, but tomorrow I will refute the Lord in my own house,' and he spoke thus to the Lord: 'Revered sir, may the Lord agree to take a meal with me tomorrow with three others?' (adhivāsetu me bhante bhagavā svātanāya attacatuṭṭho bhattachan – ti) The Lord agreed by becoming silent. Then Prince Abhaya, having understood the Lord's agreement, rising from his seat, having acknowledged the Lord, departed keeping his right side toward him. Then the Lord, at the end of that night, having dressed in the early morning, taking his bowl and robe, went up to Prince Abhaya's dwelling; and when he had reached there he sat down on the appointed seat. Then Prince Abhaya with his own hand served and satisfied the Lord with sumptuous solid and soft foods (p. 62) (atha kho abhaya rājakumāro bhagavantam paṇiṭṭena khādaniyena bhōjanīyena sabbathā santappesi sampavāresi). Then when the Lord had eaten and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, Prince Abhaya, taking a low seat, sat down at a respectful distance. Prince Abhaya, sitting down at a respectful distance, spoke thus to the Lord.

[After this the conversation proceeded, with the Buddha offering a lengthy disquisition on the types of subjects about which he talked and the conditions under which he said them. Abhaya had the last word, saying,]

'It is excellent, revered sir, it is excellent, revered sir. It is as if one might set upright what had been upset, or might disclose what had been covered, or show the way to one who had gone astray, or bring an oil-lamp into the darkness so that those with vision might see material shapes, even so is dhamma made clear in many a figure by the Lord. Revered sir, I am going to the Lord for refuge and to dhamma and to the order of monks. May the Lord accept me as a lay-disciple going for refuge from this day forth for as long as life lasts.¹¹

The ritual prescriptions of the meal are here followed to the letter. We can isolate the following sets of acts which occur in the same sequence in most, though not all, of the meal narratives:

- (1) An introduction detailing time, place and social context of the donor;
- (2) an implied or actual dispute between the donor and the Buddha (this does not occur in all cases);
- (3) the spoken invitation to attend the meal made in speech;
- (4) the Buddha's acquiescence by remaining silent;
- (5) the ritual departure of the figure who makes the request;
- (6) the Buddha coming to eat in the guise of a monk on a begging round;
- (7) the Buddha sitting down on the appointed seat;
- (8) the donor serving food to the Buddha with his own hand;
- (9) the donor taking a seat lower than the Buddha;
- (10) the donor sitting down at a respectful distance;
- (11) the donor speaking to the Buddha;
- (12) the Buddha giving a teaching;
- (13) the donor becoming a convert.

Any other name could be substituted for that of Prince Abhaya, although, even if the sequence of the events does not change, the vaṇṇa reference is significant in altering the status implications of the interaction between the two figures. Apart from the frame, virtually standard in all the 'meal narratives', formed by the set of events structuring the meal, there is a conversion frame operative here; it offers us different possibilities for the interpretation of these 'meal narratives'. It is possible, of course, to assert the interrelation of both frames, the meal functioning as the consummation and the demonstration of the conversion experience conceived of as a public event. However, the conversion frame is found frequently in situations where the meal is not given any kind of consummatory role.¹²

The initiatory structure of the offering of a seat to the Buddha may well have brāhmanical precursors, as B. Oguibenine has shown.¹³ Perhaps we are entitled to go even further and interpret the ritual significance of the meal as a deliberate reworking of the Vedic sacrifice, where initiation into the ¹¹ MI 392–6. ¹² For many examples drawn from the Su see Bailey, 'Problems'.

¹³ Oguibenine, 'Vedic Ritual', pp. 107–23. More generally see P. Masefield, 'The pursuit of merit: sacrificial devotion in the Pāli Nikāyas', in G. M. Bailey and I. Kesarcodi-Watson (eds), Bhakti Studies (Sterling, New Delhi, 1992), pp. 292–308.

saṅgha, even as a lay supporter, is sanctified by the ritual structure present in the invitation and the meal. We assume this is because the Buddha was fully aware of the brāhmaṇical cultural bedrock on which so many of his potential converts operated and knew that to extend his influence he would be required to present his teachings and normative forms of conduct within the traditionally patterned forms of behaviour. The new was once again drawing on the traditional for social confirmation.

The meal narrative just summarized is highly structured and quite repetitive in narrative sequence and language, a feature it shares with the other examples of the genre. But whilst it is important to be aware of the structural aspects of the narrative, our task must be to penetrate beneath these virtually formalized features to discover the high emotion and excitement that must have accompanied the actual event of the meal. In Mahāvagga VI there are twelve meal narratives and at least one more in Mahāvagga VII. Taken in conjunction with many others found in the M and other parts of the Canon, we have a set of rich resources available from which this subject can be studied. Each of the narratives found in the Mahāvagga contains the conversion frame and the meal frame, but is further anchored in the Vinaya as such by the proclamation of a vinaya rule at the end of the narrative. Within these three frames different kinds of content can be inserted and the individual narratives become superficially quite different in spite of a similarity induced by the frames, the motifs and the sequences in which these are arranged. These differences are invaluable for forcing us to consider what the historical conditions producing such narratives might have been.

Whilst each of the meal narratives contains a sequence of events illustrated by the Abhaya episode, we do not find absolute identity in all the sequences,¹⁴ but the same motifs, within a tight range of possible variants,¹⁵ seem to recur in virtually every narrative. The content of the individual narratives differs considerably, as does the vinaya rule the Buddha proclaims at the end of the tale. The other principal differences relate to the characters involved and the locations where the meals are given. These locations occur over most of the territory where the Buddha wandered. They confirm the text's desire to have us believe he was widely known and esteemed over this area and that the large-scale feeding of the Buddha and the monks was well accepted as a means whereby a lay follower or a prominent person could publicly express his adherence to the Buddha's dhamma.

¹⁴ For example, in the case of the wealthy householder Meṇḍaka (Vin I 242) the progressive talk is given before the meal.

¹⁵ In Vin I 224–6 and 238–40 there is no formal invitation followed by a meal, only cooking of particular foods which people, following the path of the Buddha and the Order, consider them not to have had yet.

Many of the meal narratives¹⁶ do not begin with a particular person hearing of the arrival of the Buddha with the saṅgha. They simply begin with a particular person approaching the Buddha and then the interaction leading to the meal takes place. But of those in the Mahāvagga there are five instances where the person concerned hears of the Buddha's imminent arrival (Vin I 231–3; 242; 243–5; 247) or hears him being praised when he is already there (Vin I 236ff.); and expressing a wish to see (dassanāya) him, mounts a chariot and goes to visit him attended by an entourage. It is not just out of respect for him that people strove to see him when he was on tour, nor can we be at all certain that, when a noun or verb derived from das 'to see' is used of the person who wants to see the Buddha, that usage corresponds to the devotional sense so common in later Hinduism. At least two of the meal narratives in the Mahāvagga depict camp followers, whose purpose¹⁷ for following is to feed a member of the Order. In the first of these examples (Vin I 220–1) the desperation of one of the followers is illustrated very vividly. The Buddha was walking on tour from Benares to Andhakavinda, followed in carts by many camp followers each of whom was hoping to have a turn to feed the Buddha or one of the monks.

Then it occurred to a certain brahmin who did not receive his turn, 'For the last two months I have been following the Order of monks with the Awakened One at its head, thinking, "When I get my turn, I will make a meal for them", but I have not got my turn. I am alone, and my household affairs are in great decline. What if I were to look into the kitchen and prepare what I can not see there?'¹⁸

This points to a strong competitive attitude amongst those wishing either to see the Buddha or to gain the merit achieved by the offering of food. We will notice more of this in other meal narratives.

All of the meal narratives are given within the context of the Buddha being on tour at a particular time. No doubt touring occupied the majority of his time except during the rainy season. Though we would not want to suggest these tours were carefully stage-managed, they were centred on the figure of the Buddha himself and the evidence from the texts, especially given the elite background of those who host the meals, is that his fame has preceded him. Most people are very eager to see him, an eagerness played down dramatically by the inevitably formulaic wording used in the narratives,¹⁹ and this bespeaks a fame, possibly cultivated, as we explored in chapter 5, apparently enabling him to remain aloof from the hustle and bustle of the tour and daily life in the places where he stops and definitely giving him all the more esteem because of this. In no sense does he need to pursue converts, they come to him. Their eagerness to approach him directly and the forewarning many of those who give meals have of his coming must have worked to build up the anticipation of the people who lived in the areas through which he travelled, and would ultimately contribute to the creation of the public spectacle the meal must often have been.

¹⁶ Vin I 212–13; 216–18; 220–1; 222–4; 224–6; 228–30.

¹⁷ If that is what we read in the sentence 'yadā paṭipātim labhissāma, tadā bhattaṃ karissāmeti', Vin I 221; 238.

¹⁸ Vin I 220.

As far as it is possible to ascertain, all the people offering the meals fall into the category of elites. Most are named with their occupational status. Here is the list:

- (1) Vin I 212–13 A certain brahmin.
- (2) I 216–18 The wealthy lay followers Suppiya and Suppiyā.
- (3) I 220–1 A brahmin.
- (4) I 222–4 The young minister of little faith.
- (5) I 224–6 Belaṭṭha Kaccāna who gives sugar to each of the 1,250 monks. We presume he is a merchant.
- (6) I 229 Sunidha and Vassakāra, chief ministers in Magadha (cf. D II 87ff.).
- (7) I 231–3 Ambapālī. A wealthy courtesan (cf. D II 96–8).
- (8) I 233–238 Siha, the general who was formerly a Jain.
- (9) I 238–40 Country people who hitch their wagons outside a monastery as it is their turn to make a meal.
- (10) I 240–5 Meṇḍaka, a wealthy householder (i.e., farmer) and possessor of psychic powers.
- (11) I 245–6 Keniya the matted-hair ascetic.
- (12) I 247–9 Roja, a well-known Malla who wants to provide a succession of meals. He wants his turn like the people in No.6.
- (13) I 290 Visākhā, Migāra's mother, who gives food to the Order and then makes an offer of total material support.

¹⁹ For example, the following form of words is typical: 'Then Belaṭṭha Kaccāna went up to the Lord. After he had gone up and greeted the Lord, he stood at a respectful distance. As he was standing at a respectful distance, Belaṭṭha Kaccāna said this to the Lord.' (atha kko belaṭṭho kaccāno yena bhagavā tenupasaṅkami. Upasaṅkamitvā bhagavantam abhivādetvā ekamantaṃ atthāsi. Ekamantaṃ thito kko belaṭṭho kaccāno bhagavantam etadavoca.) Vin I 224. A striking exception here would be the instance of Roja the Malla who went to meet the Buddha only because his tribe had made an agreement that anyone who did not would be fined five hundred (?) if they did not go to meet him (Vin I 247).

A schematic list of the individuals and their class status produces the following:

- brahmins (2) [Vin I 212; 217];
- political elites (2) [I 222; 229];
- wealthy householders (5) [I 216: 238; 242; 247; 290];
- a general (1) [I 233];
- a Jain ascetic (1) [I 245];
- a merchant (1) [I 224];
- a courtesan (1) [I 231].

This cannot be taken as a complete cross-section of ancient Indian society roughly covering the period from about 600–200 BCE, but it fits very closely the image of elite figures who populate Buddhist literature (see chapter 2 above). Noting that these meals are specified always for the saṅgha as well as for the Buddha, and that in the Mahāvagga narratives, the Buddha is usually accompanied by 1,250 monks, the logistics of the meal production requires the person who provides them to have been somebody of considerable means. Imagine how much space and food would have been needed to feed the Buddha and five hundred monks, let alone twelve hundred and fifty monks, the number usually given.

Not all supporters of the Buddha came from the elite classes, though it is they who figure most in the literature. It is therefore instructive to examine one meal narrative, not taken from the Mahāvagga, but from the M (II p. 45ff.), where status difference between potential donors is strongly emphasized. The Buddha tells a story about a past Buddha named Kassapa. He lived in a town called Vebhalinga where he had a monastery. His chief supporter (upaṭṭhāko abosi aggupaṭṭhāko . . . p. 46) there was Ghaṭikāra the potter, whose best friend was a brahmin named Jotipāla.

Ghaṭikāra said to the brahmin:

Let us go, dear Jotipāla, we will go up to the Lord Kassapa . . . in order to see him. I think a sight of the Lord, perfected one, fully Self-Awakened One, is really worthwhile.²⁰

However, Jotipāla was unconvinced and said,

Yes, dear Ghaṭikāra, but of what use is it to see this little shaveling recluse (muṇḍakena samaṇakena)?

Ghaṭikāra then tried various means of persuasion to bring Jotipāla round to his way, finally pulling his hair. Jotipāla was so amazed, he thought, ²⁰ Āyāma, samma Jotipāla, Kassapaṃ bhagavantaṃ arahantaṃ sammāsaṃbuddhaṃ dassanāya upasaṅkissāma; sādhusammatam hi me tassa bhagato dassanaṃ arahato sammāsaṃbuddhassati.

It's really wonderful, it's really marvellous, that this potter Ghaṭikāra, a recluse of lowly birth, should touch my hair, when my head has been bathed, and should think, 'Indeed this is definitely not insignificant.'²¹

Both finally approached Kassapa and sat at a respectful distance.

Then, Ānanda, the potter Ghaṭikāra and the brahmin youth Jotipāla went up to the Lord Kassapa . . . When they had reached him, Ghaṭikāra the potter greeted the Lord Kassapa . . . and sat down at a respectful distance. But the brahmin youth Jotipāla exchanged greetings with the Lord Kassapa . . . conversed pleasantly and politely, and sat down at a respectful distance.²²

Ghaṭikāra then asked Kassapa to teach the dhamma to Jotipāla and he did this. Then Jotipāla asked Ghaṭikāra why he had not renounced after having heard the dhamma. In response he said that he was required to look after his blind parents.

Jotipāla said he understood and declared his intention to renounce. He and Ghaṭikāra went back to Kassapa and this time both sat at a respectful distance from him, but only after gaining his permission.

[Kassapa then went to Benares. Kikī, King of Benares, heard of his arrival and] ' . . . had many splendid vehicles harnessed, mounted a splendid vehicle and set off for Benares with the many splendid vehicles and with great royal pomp in order to see (dassanāya) the Lord Kassapa . . . '

On finding Kassapa he approached him and sat at a respectful distance. Kassapa gave him a talk on dhamma. Then the king said, 'Revered sir, will the Lord agree to have a meal with me tomorrow, together with the Order of monks?' Ānanda, the Lord gave his agreement by becoming silent. Then, Ānanda, Kikī the king of Kāsi understood the Lord Kassapa's consent, rose from his seat, saluted the Lord Kassapa, and departed, keeping his right side towards him.

Then, Ānanda, the Lord Kassapa dressed in the morning, took his bowl and robe, and went to the dwelling of Kikī, king of Kāsi. After he gone there, he sat down on the designated seat (paññatte āsane nisīdi) accompanied by the Order of monks. Then, Ānanda, Kikī the king of Kāsi with his own hand served the Order of monks, headed by the enlightened Kassapa, with sumptuous foods, solid and soft, and satiated them. Then, Ānanda, when the Lord Kassapa had eaten and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, Kikī, the king of Kāsi, taking a low seat (nīcaṃ āsanam), sat down at a respectful distance.

²¹ Acchariaṃ vata bho, abbhutaṃ vata bho. Yatra hi nāmāyaṃ Ghaṭikāro kumbhakāro ittarajacco samāno ambhakaṃ sisanahātānaṃ kesesu parāmasiṭṭhaṃ maññissati; na va' idam orakaṃ maññe bhavissati.

P. 47.

²² . . . saddhiṃ sammodi, sammodaniyāyaṃ kathaṃ sārāṇiyāyaṃ vītisāretvā ekamantaṃ nisīdi.

After this Kassapa did not, as one would expect, give a talk on dhamma, in response to the meal given by the king. Before he was given the chance, the king asked him to accept a 'rains-residence' (vassāvāso) with him. Kassapa refused, saying he had already accepted such an invitation. Twice more he is asked and both times refuses. After the final refusal, the king became unhappy.

He then asked Kassapa if he had another supporter. Kassapa said the potter Ghaṭikāra was his chief supporter. Recognizing the king's depression he explained why Ghaṭikāra did not and would not grieve. He enumerated a list of qualities he possessed (pp. 51–2):

He has taken the triple refuge.

He refrains from killing creatures, from theft, from incorrect enjoyment of sense pleasures, from lying and from sloth.

He has unwavering confidence in the three jewels.

He has the correct morality.

And so on, until finally, recounting that he looked after his blind parents, he predicted he would attain final nibbāna and not be reborn.

Kassapa then tells another anecdote about the potter. One day whilst in Ghaṭikāra's village he went up to the potter's parents and asked where the potter had gone. They confirmed his departure, but added that he had left behind instructions for the Buddha to be provided with food to eat. The Buddha ate the food, rose up from his seat (uṭṭhāy' āsanā) and departed. Later, when Ghaṭikāra returned and discovered Kassapa had had a meal at the house, he believed himself to have gained (lābhā vata me suladdham vata me) through Kassapa's having been there.

He then recounted a second anecdote about Ghaṭikāra. Kassapa was staying in the potter's village and discovered his own hut was leaking. Kassapa told the monks to go and take grass from Ghaṭikāra's hut. His parents asked who was taking the grass and why. When told it was for Kassapa they encouraged its being taken away. Ghaṭikāra took the act of taking the grass as a vote of Kassapa's confidence in him and then, as the narrative tells us, no rain fell into the open roof for three months. King Kikī then sent five hundred cartloads of food to Ghaṭikāra. The potter expressed his satisfaction to the king's messenger, saying he knew the king had much to do. Finally the Buddha declared himself to have been the brahmin Jotipāla.²³

A folk-tale theme may lie at the basis of this narrative. The poor potter Ghaṭikāra outdoes the wealthy king by his piety and (measured by his commitment to his blind parents as much as by anything else) gains a material fortune from the very same king, a fortune matched by the religious fortune he has received from the Buddha's recognition of the potter's devotion towards him, thus confirming the persistent Buddhist view that a person's measure is determined by conduct, not by source of birth. But above all this narrative is about the means of measuring the status of people who interact with the Buddha. The three highest classes are in evidence here, represented by Jotipāla, Kikī and Ghaṭikāra respectively. Each represents a different degree of devotion. The king and the potter both wish to experience a dassana of the Buddha Kassapa, with all the devotional implications that act entails. Jotipāla alone is almost hostile to this and is prevailed upon to attend the dassana only by mild violence. Yet, of the three, he is the only one who becomes a member of the Order and renounces, the other two retaining the status of lay follower. Even then Kikī's status remains unclear, suggesting his sumptuous feeding of the Order and Kassapa may have been a demonstration of conspicuous generosity. He does not even receive the habitual progressive talk, although Kassapa's justification as to why he will spend the rain retreat with Ghaṭikāra rather than with the king contains much in it that is clearly of a doctrinal nature. It is as though the brahmin was the prize convert into the Order, an observation supported by the statistics of conversion we have at our disposal. Anybody else could be converted as a lay follower, but a brahmin brought status with him. He was of the highest class and was more associated with the high-status world view associated with the world of Sanskrit learning than was a representative of any other class. His was a religious vocation, even if by the time of the Buddha, this was probably observed in the breach. Conversion of a brahmin meant that the Buddha's teaching was becoming considered a viable alternative to the prevailing dominant cultural position, or at least this was what it was intended to mean.

²³ M II 45ff.

Both Kikī and Ghaṭikāra play the traditional roles expected of members of their groups. In the magnitude and the opulence of the meal Kikī supplies to Kassapa and then subsequently to Ghaṭikāra, presumably as a mediating figure in respect of Kassapa, the role of the political elites as providers of large-scale support to the Order is expressed. As for Ghaṭikāra, he is the archetypal image of the village lay Buddhist who supports the individual monk in whatever manner he can. The symbolism of the blind parents, found often elsewhere in Indian literature (e.g., the ascetic killed by Pāṇḍu in the Ādiparvan of the MBh), lends more dramatic emphasis to his domestic responsibility than would the simple declaration that he has a family to support. He must perform his household responsibilities whilst continuing to function as a Buddhist and modifying his behaviour accordingly. Note that both figures offer the Buddha a meal.

The size and nature of the meals is perfectly consonant with the social and economic standings of the respective donors and as such there is no message of status disjunction being expressed here. Where the latter assumes its full force is in Kassapa's refusal of Kikī's invitation to spend the rains retreat with him. The contrasting emotions experienced by the favoured donor and the one who is refused are quite symmetrical, but do not explicitly turn on status disjunction so much as failure and joy in the wake of Kassapa's refusal. Perhaps this is how the Buddha would have wanted the situation to be given his firmness on evaluating a person by his expressed moral action rather than by his hereditary status.

The meal the Buddha takes with King Kikī is typical of those formal meals that require a public invitation: an acceptance by silence, a gap of time between invitation and meal, the setting up of a designated seat, the clear manifestation of status distinction – a kind of obeisance before the Buddha – and the Buddha's acceptance of the meal by offering a teaching on dhamma. As for the meal associated with Ghaṭikāra, this is nothing other than the normal begging round, given more significance here because of what it is being contrasted with.

THE MEAL AS PUBLIC EVENT

For a large town of twenty thousand the visit of the Buddha whilst on tour would have been a major event, no doubt attracting widespread interest, even considering the short notice given for the meal. But for a small village, whose population would have probably been at least doubled at the time of the visit, the coming of the Buddha or a prominent monk must have been a huge event. The magnificence of all the events surrounding the visit and the possibilities for sumptuary display would therefore have been enormous. This magnificence is communicated as much by the positions and the wealth of those who give the meals as it is by the occasional formulaic descriptions of the ornate chariots²⁴ used by certain of the meal givers (Ambapālī, the Licchavi princes, Meṇḍaka, General Sīha), in contrast to the Buddha who would have been on foot, dressed in a totally unostentatious manner. Nor was the display just for the sake of display, if it is ever. It must have been a recognition of the financial power of the person who paid for the meal, a conviction strongly supported by the jealousy aroused in the minds of those parties unsuccessful in receiving the Buddha's attentions, signalled by his acceptance of their invitation for a meal. The most famous example of this is given in the narrative where the Licchavi princes offer money to Ambapālī to entice her to give up the meal with the Buddha (Vin I 232; D II 196). Even after her refusal they still invite the Buddha but he declares he is unable to accept their invitation because of his prior engagement with Ambapālī. At this they angrily declare, amazingly in front of the Buddha, 'We have been defeated by this mango-girl' (Vin I 232). Clearly, there is an element of obligation here on the Buddha's part.

²⁴ Ambapālī hears of the Buddha's arrival in Koṭigāma, then 'the courtesan Ambapālī had some magnificent vehicles harnessed, mounted a magnificent vehicle, and, accompanied by the magnificent vehicles, left Vesālī in order to see the Lord.' Vin I 231; 242. These words are not used of General Sīha, but he did go and meet the Buddha with an entourage of 500 chariots.

The tinge of jealousy, undergirded by competition, is even more pronounced in one of the prominent passages in the Vinaya dealing with Anāthapiṇḍika. Described as (Vin II 154) 'the husband of a sister of a (great) merchant of Rājagaha', Anāthapiṇḍika goes to Rājagaha at the same time as the Buddha and members of the Order have been invited to a meal at the merchant's place. So lavish are the preparations Anāthapiṇḍika sees that he wonders, 'Now is this householder holding the ritual journey to the bride's house or the ritual departure from the bride's house, or has a great sacrifice been organized or has King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha been invited tomorrow together with his troops?' (155) The merchant denies any of these as the explanation for the gathering and says, 'I have organized a huge sacrifice. I have invited the Order led by the Buddha for tomorrow.'²⁵ Although such events seem commonplace in the world of the Pāli Canon, we are still entitled to ask if a more nuanced reading of the passage is to be expected. Would the feeding of a religious person normally attract such approbation and munificence as this? The appearance of the Buddha is being explicitly compared to an event of great secular importance. Or are such events reflections of the magnitude of the large śrauta sacrifices – coming into desuetude even in the Buddha's time – where large crowds must have been present and the idea of the special status of the sacrifice as a ritual meal was always in the minds of those attending the performance?

By way of illustration of similarity between the śrauta sacrifice and the 'total' event of the Buddha visiting a village we cite the Kūṭadantasutta where both events are obliquely juxtaposed. The plot of this sutta concerns the transformation of Kūṭadanta from a traditional brahmin into a figure who becomes devoted to the Buddha, though he does not appear to become a convert. When the Buddha arrives at the brahmin village of Khānumata with 500 monks and locates himself at the Ambalatthikā park, Kūṭadanta is about to sponsor a huge sacrifice:

²⁵ Vin II 155. The sentence 'I have organized a huge sacrifice' seems anomalous here. The Buddha was a well-known critic of animal sacrifice. It is possible that yañño could refer to any type of celebratory occasion or that the sentence 'Api ca me mahāyañño paccupaṭṭito' really implies a negative.

At that time a huge sacrifice was being prepared for Kūṭadanta the brahmin. A hundred bulls, a hundred steers, a hundred heifers, a hundred goats, and a hundred rams had been brought to the post for sacrifice.²⁶

But his plans are upstaged by the Buddha's arrival. All those – brahmins and householders – attending the sacrifice hear that the Buddha has arrived in the Ambalatthikā park and leave the sacrifice in order to visit the Buddha.²⁷ The text is much more florid than is the description of their departure. They are portrayed hearing a set of standard epithets of the Buddha's achievements, including his enlightenment. As such he is placed in competition with the brahmin.

Kūṭadanta asks his doorkeeper why all the people are leaving. Informed that the Buddha is staying outside of the village he goes to meet him, though only after some other brahmins question the respective status of the Buddha and Khānumata. Kūṭadanta meets the Buddha and asks him about a success in performing a sacrifice in its three modes and its sixteen accessories. The Buddha provides a long explanation in which he describes a sacrifice performed by a mythical king which uses ghee, oil, butter, milk, honey and sugar, but no animals. The Buddha then explains how any sacrifice should be transformed into a procedure for becoming a lay Buddhist and practising the five abstinences and the other requirements for the laity. At the end Khānumata is so impressed he invites the Buddha to a meal, and

The Blessed One dressed early in the morning, put on his outer robe, and taking his bowl with him, went with the collection of monks to Kūṭadanta's sacrificial site, and sat down there on the seat designated for him. And Kūṭadanta the Brahmin satisfied the collection of monks led by the Buddha, with his own hand, with sweet food, both hard and soft . . .²⁸

Pointedly the text tells us the meal was held on the site for Kūṭadanta's śrauta sacrifice and, therefore, that it replaced it. The significance of this is emphasized by virtue of the amount of space given in the narrative to the mythical king Mahāvijita's preparation²⁹ of a śrauta sacrifice and especially of the recommendation given him by his purohita:

Then let his majesty the king send invitations to whosoever there may be in his realm who are kṣatriyas, vassals of his, either in the country or the towns; or who are ministers and officials of his, either in the country or the towns; or who are ²⁶ DI 128–29.

²⁷ Ibid.

²⁸ DI 149–50.

²⁹ DI 135–42.

wealthy householders, either in the country or the towns, saying: 'I intend to offer a large sacrifice. Let the venerable people acknowledge what will be conducive to my happiness and welfare for many days and nights.'³⁰

Both the śrauta sacrifice and the public meal for the Buddha were opportunities for public display, status validation and delimitation of social hierarchy.

Returning to the narrative dealing with Anāthapiṇḍika and the merchant of Rājagaha, we note competition also emerges as a theme later in it. Anāthapiṇḍika is said to have become a lay devotee and invited the Buddha for a meal. On discovering this a merchant of Rājagaha says to him, 'It is said that you invited the Order with the Buddha at its head, householder, for tomorrow. But you are a newcomer. Householder, I will give you the money (veyyāyikam) so that you will be able to feed the Order with the Buddha at its head.' To this Anāthapiṇḍika responds, 'Thank you, householder, but I have the money to make a meal for the Order with the Awakened One at its head.'³¹ The urban council of Rājagaha makes the same offer and receives the same response. Both the great merchant of Rājagaha and the urban council of Rājagaha must be reckoned important symbols of wealth here and elsewhere in the Nikāyas.

We should never underestimate the display component in the meal as an expression of competition. Here is a case where it is known the Buddha is on tour and will be visiting a town or a city at a particular time. A large number of monks are moving across the countryside, presumably on the trade routes connecting the large cities, their itinerary probably being known by the direction in which they are moving. Always the event, when it happens, concentrates on the public display of the aloof figure of the Buddha being personally fed by the wealthy person who has paid for the meal. Even when they have slaves, as in the case of Suppiya and Suppiyā, it is not the slaves who feed the Buddha but the two donors. Whilst this must be taken as a personal display of homage (and respect, if the devotional aspect of the whole event is downplayed), especially since it is witnessed by the saṅgha as well as those in the household of the donor and any other onlookers, its effects for the on-going acceptance of Buddhism must have been considerable. One of the most prominent people in the village or town, where prominence is determined by wealth, occupation or social position, is demonstrating obeisance to the famous new teacher, whose reputation spreads like wildfire. Given the importance of the role model provided by the elites who organize the meals, the Buddha's public gaining of a convert must have raised or simply confirmed the status of the new belief system with its rigorous social practices. Moreover, it establishes a direct connection between the teachings, the practice and the creation of wealth, in a way quite astonishing in view of the Buddha's own level of renunciation. As such, in a kind of perverse way it gives dramatic emphasis to the entire new discourse the Buddha attempts to inculcate through his teachings.

³⁰ DI 137. ³¹ Vin II 157.

But there is much more to it than this. We suggested earlier that the meals, in spite of the conversion frame in which they are partially structured, offered the possibility for sumptuary display. Huge expense would be incurred in feeding twelve hundred and fifty people and the extent of this expense would surely have been recognized by all who participated in the event. The time frame also becomes important as in most instances where the meal occurs in a fixed location, and not intermittently whilst the monks and the Buddha are moving along the road, it is only held one day after the Buddha has arrived. Surely this would have been enough time for the news that the Buddha was to be fêted at a particular meal to have spread around the entire village or town. In an environment where conspicuous patronage to brahmins and other sects had been long established, the offering of huge meals would not have been undertaken just as a means of acquiring merit, but also as a failsafe means of displaying wealth as such to those who lived in the districts surrounding them. It could be regarded as confirming the socio-economic status the meal-giver had acquired through the material wealth he/she had accumulated.

Beyond the coding of status differences tied up in the ritual meal, and the strongly initiatory structure of the meal as a process of social interaction, we are entitled to suggest there may have been different pragmatic motivations for the Buddha's accepting meals with wealthy brahmins (for which see chapter 5 above) who were renowned for their knowledge and learning and whatever spiritual accomplishments they might have achieved, as well as with elites whose position was owed to material possessions more than to religious virtuosity. That is, from one he receives material support, from the other he receives direct cultural legitimacy, if we consider how important the brahmins were as purveyors of a cultural position they themselves, at least, would have liked to be hegemonic. Both were essential if the fledgling Buddhist saṅgha was to survive beyond the Buddha's own death. We have to bear in mind continually that, like the brahmins, the Buddha himself was offering a total position about culture and society. He could not be reduced to the level of another sectary deriving his principal inspiration from some offshoot of brāhmanical thought.

The subject of competition between religious sectaries, whether implied or otherwise, is constantly in play in the meal narratives. In an overt sense the passage where Abhaya provides the meal involves the abandonment of his allegiance to the Jains, at least in his acceptance of their beliefs, and the same applies in the case of General Siha. For these situations the Buddha's grasp of metaphysical argument is sufficient to guarantee his victory. Yet there are other instances where his wish to demonstrate his own unique status comes to the fore. Of these instances the most spectacular, and no doubt productive of social esteem, are those where he displays his super-normal powers. Several of the meal narratives in the Mahāvagga instance this use of his powers. One concerns³² interaction between the Buddha and the two wealthy laypeople, Suppiya and Suppiyā.

The Buddha and the monks were staying at the Deer Park. Suppiyā wandered from cell to cell asking, 'Who, honoured sirs, is ill? Can something be brought for someone?'

One monk, having drunk a purgative, asked for meat-broth (paṭicchādiya) and was told by Suppiyā it would be supplied. She asked a servant to find the meat, but none was to be found because it was a meatless day. On being informed of this, and not wanting to lie to the monk, she cut a piece from her own thigh. She instructed her servant to say that if anybody came around looking for her they should be told she was ill.

Then her husband Suppiya returned and asked the servant about the whereabouts of his wife. He went in to see her and she told him the whole story of what had happened.

'Why are you lying down?'

'I am ill,' she said.

'What is causing you pain?' Then the laywoman Suppiyā raised the matter with the layman Suppiya, thinking, 'It is really marvellous, it is wonderful, that Suppiyā is so faithful and believing that she even gives up her own flesh. Is there anything else she would not give?'³³ . . .

Then in a state of joy he went to see the Buddha and respectfully invited him to a meal, an invitation the Buddha accepted. A magnificent meal was organized and the Buddha arrived on the following morning. The Buddha then enquired as to the health of Suppiyā and was told she was ill. In spite of this the Buddha asked for her to be brought before him:

³² Vin I 216–18.

³³ Vin I 217, atha kho Suppiyo upāsako acchariyaṃ vata bho abbhutaṃ vata bho yāva saddhāyaṃ Suppiyā pasannā, yatra hi nāma attano pi maṃsāni pariccattāni.

Then the layman Suppiya took hold of the laywoman Suppiyā and brought her along. With the Lord's sight on her, that huge wound was healed, the skin became good and small hairs appeared on it.³⁴

On witnessing this both Suppiya and Suppiyā remarked upon the great psychic powers of the Buddha. Then they served the meal to the Buddha and the saṅgha and received a progressive talk from the Buddha who then departed.

The Buddha then asked which monk requested food from Suppiyā and asked if he had enquired about it. When he said he had not the Buddha rebuked him and forbade monks to eat human flesh.

Although perhaps an extreme example to cite because of its reference to cannibalism – whose historical veracity we might question – it is a typical instance of the kinds of obligations bearing on both parties participating in the meal where the Buddha is the honoured guest. As soon as the husband and wife find out about the presence of the Buddha they undertake to make contact with him. We can be certain of their wealth by their possession of slaves and their capacity to feed all the monks.

Their generosity towards the monks is twofold. In the first place Suppiyā attempts to provide succour to any monk who is ill and in doing so engages in an amazing form of self-sacrifice by offering a piece from her own leg.³⁵ This is subsequently rewarded by the Buddha in a scene which is a clear structural reversal of her own action – woman heals monk, Buddha heals woman. His action is an implicit reward for her own self-sacrifice and, considered in a broader frame, is both an expression of the reward for her faith and a demonstration of the Buddha's super-normal powers, his vision in this case. It is almost a sanction of her action, though this kind of action is disallowed when the relevant vinaya rule is promulgated. The second expression of generosity is the standard offering of the meal as a reward for which the two laypersons receive a teaching in the dhamma. In itself the very visit of the Buddha must have functioned as a confirmation of the lay status of the layman, but it may have also indicated a kind of status marker amongst Buddhists even at that very early time in the development of the Order.

The devotional quality of the narrative is manifest and it focuses on both the Buddha and Suppiyā. Her devotional credentials are considered impeccable by her husband, for when she cuts the flesh from her own leg, he says, 'It is really marvellous (acchariyaṃ), it is wonderful (abbhutaṃ), that this Suppiyā is so faithful and believing that she gives up even her own flesh.' The words acchariyaṃ and abbhūtaṃ both convey the idea that the event to which they refer is in some measure absolutely extraordinary. In the West we might say supernaturally so. Both words, and especially the latter, are used in the myriads of devotional narratives found in the later Hindu Purāṇas.³⁶ But to bring the message fully home Suppiya and Suppiyā virtually give the same expression verbatim as a reaction to the Buddha's healing of Suppiyā's leg by his divine vision. The whole exchange can perhaps be explained in terms of the transfer of merit doctrine. Equally, the devotional ambience of some of the terminology and the emphasis placed on building up a picture of Suppiyā's own devotional attitude (passanā) and the Buddha's great psychic powers, to be used beneficially for his devotees, must have had the effect of depicting an enormously enhanced figure in contrast to many other śramaṇas claiming similar powers.

³⁴ Vin I 219, tassā saba dassanena bhagavato tāvamahā vaṇo rūlho abosi succhavi lomajāto.

³⁵ This section of the narrative – reward for devotion – seems strongly folkloric with the addition of a Buddhist tinge in demonstrating the direct workings of merit.

The second example of this is found in the fairly lengthy narrative dealing with the wealthy householder Meṇḍaka.³⁷ Because Meṇḍaka was already famed for his great psychic powers in producing huge quantities of grain and food, King Bimbisāra ordered one of his ministers to observe such powers in person. Meṇḍaka gave a demonstration of his power by feeding the minister's army and the minister returned to Rājagaha in order to inform Bimbisāra. The narrative could easily end there and be self-contained, yet it is really just the preface to a meal narrative.

[The Buddha set out on tour for Bhaddiya [where Meṇḍaka lived] and Meṇḍaka heard of his imminent arrival, given almost in the form of a Hindu stotra. After describing all the Buddha's achievements it ends with the words] It would be good to see perfected ones like this (Sādhū kho pana tatharūpānaṃ arahataṃ dassanaṃ hotu ti).

[Immediately he decided to see the Buddha, only to be hampered by members of other sects who declared that as a Jain, it was inappropriate for him to court the Buddha. When he saw the Buddha he was given the progressive talk and assumed lay status. It was then that he invited the Buddha for a meal on the next day. As soon as the Buddha arrived he preached a progressive talk, ate the meal, then left.

After he had gone Meṇḍaka ordered his workmen to load food on to carts so they could follow the Buddha and feed him on his travels.]

Here the Buddha performs no miraculous deeds expected of a holy man. Instead that honour goes to Meṇḍaka, already a special person when the ³⁶ For examples, see Greg Bailey, 'The semantics of bhakti in the Vāmana Purāṇa', Rivista degli Studi Orientali, 62, 1988, pp. 25–57.

³⁷ Vin I 240–5.

Buddha meets him, and publicly known as such. His open acts of obeisance to the Buddha, first deliberately rejecting the protestations of the Jains and then receiving the Buddha's teachings and holding a meal, are explicit and deliberately communicated signs that the Buddha is of a higher status than himself. In addition, already knowing of his special status, he betrays the devotional ambience of the whole narrative in his wish 'to see the Buddha'.

The emphasis laid on figures such as Menḍaka and others mentioned in the meal narratives successfully conveys their own importance in the communities where they lived. Equally, as a reflection of them, each narrative measures the great significance of the Buddha as a new, perhaps unique, figure who has temporarily entered the same community. When the meal is introduced it offers the possibility of sumptuary display, a procedure absolutely applicable to both principal participants in the meal event. For the donor it is an offering of merit and an expression of his status in the local area. As applied to the Buddha, it underscores for non-Buddhists, who witness or hear of the meal, his capacity to enter an area and to be immediately fêted as a regional religious figure of proven fame and achievement. When we note the frequent addition of the conversion frame to the meal narrative, it is clear that the meal event forms a valuable 'marketing' function for the Buddha.

Conclusion

Buddhist Studies have been prosecuted in the West for the last one hundred and eighty years, if not longer. During that time the basic sources, at least in Indic languages, have begun to be excavated, some extensively. The contours of the teachings of the various schools have been outlined and their overlaps recognized. Increasingly the full context of the emergence of Buddhism on Indian soil has been clarified and its complexity determined. In turn this has allowed scholars to work in the understanding that the Buddhist evidence is just one component of the complete body of primary sources defining the total environment of North Indian history in the last five centuries of the first millennium BCE. An important implication of this is that the development of Buddhism can be ascertained in a more comprehensive way on the basis of evidence coming from other than Buddhist sources, such that we will not have to rely simply on inference from literary texts not necessarily designed to mirror the day-to-day realities of the empirical world. Thus the emergence and growth of Buddhism can now be understood as just one of several developments in ancient North Indian culture registering on the historical record from the sixth to the second centuries BCE. Its use as a governing interpretative tool for this history will be correspondingly modified so that it will no longer be allowed to assume the broad hermeneutical priority it has had even for areas far beyond itself.

To bring the time frame closer to the contemporary period, we note that during the last two decades any perception of a monolithic Buddhism has been severely dissipated as a result of the input from the anthropology of lived Buddhism and the re-evaluation of the early Vinaya texts from a perspective emphasizing social history, especially through the gaze supplied by the interaction between monk, nun and laity, whether Buddhist or not. Buddhism has come to be looked upon as a rich religio-cultural tradition operating successfully at different levels of society and as flourishing because it succeeded in adjusting itself to all these levels, being simultaneously influenced by, and influencing, them.

Throughout this book we have stressed the seeming paradox between the intense ascetic and renunciatory imperative associated uncompromisingly with the founding of early Buddhism, on the one hand, and on the other its capacity to adapt itself to the very real changes occurring in all the non-religious areas of life during the early centuries of its emergence. In itself this is a theme running consistently across every chapter, though sometimes, especially in section one 'Context', it is present beneath the surface rather than standing in the front line. Conceived in a totalistic sense, as a cultural system Buddhism was always able to operate with these two, potentially antagonistic, components, the first of which was essential for the distinctiveness of the early Buddhist Order, the second for its on-going survival. The latter it has done with great success in many cultures because it could maintain an integrity of doctrine and practice in the midst of variant forms consistent with this integrity. In short, Buddhism makes sense only if it is conceded that there are several different Buddhisms operative even within the one culture.

This book rests firmly on the assumption that it could not be otherwise. Despite the possibility of identifying a distinct doctrinal and practical integrity within Buddhism, it is always necessary to remember that even in the Buddha's time it is likely to have developed in a society consisting of many distinct communities, communities which contextualized a growing religion and fragmented it in the mirror of this society. In the third section of the book we have laid focus on this fragmentation of culture – not fragmented to the individuals within it, but to an outsider looking in from without twenty-five centuries later – and have argued that the Buddhist monks operated in terms of it in two ways. On the one hand, as representatives of a relatively uniform transcendent view – mirroring the wish for uniformity of the newly emergent political elite running large-scale states – standing outside of pluralistic cultures, they acted as an ideological glue. On the other hand, they identified rival elite groups in society – groups such as the brahmins, the Jains and other śramaṇa groups – each of which claimed the superiority of its own transcendental and totalistic vision of human existence. Towards such groups their attitude was defined by competition, the intensity of which varied according to the Buddhists' perception of the potential success of these competitors in winning souls. Hostility was directed by the Buddhists as much towards those figures – exemplified by the six heretical teachers – whose views were not too far from those of the early Buddhists, as it was towards the brahmins. The latter not only had a distinctive vision of the transcendent, into which was anchored a totalistic view of society and culture, but also basked in the complacency of an elite knowing its success in defining patterns of influence and control.

Whilst likely an elite movement in its beginnings, the early Buddhist Order had to struggle to influence the non-religious elites to support it financially, materially and, more subtly, with the general imprimatur of the elites acknowledging Buddhism both as distinct from other rival groups and as a public group with as much legitimacy as the brahmins. Success in its struggle was clearly achieved by the time of Aśoka (269–242 BCE) – where religious patronage is so strongly reflected in his inscriptions – and this perhaps compels us to read this success back into the Pāli sources where the evidence of strivings towards such a result is to be sought in the Buddha's own interaction with political and economic elites. Even without the kind of relative certainty available from the Aśokan material, we still need to have some precision as to why the Buddha's message would have been attractive to the elites whose status rested on political and economic foundations. We have suggested that the Buddha taught a universal philosophy, cutting aside the more partial views of the brahmins and the other śramaṇa groups, both more tied to particular power bases than was Buddhism, which, at least in theory, sought independence from any power base. To identify with such an outlook may have provided psychological justification to the kings of the expanding new polities who fought their enemies with ideological tools as well as with armies and tried to promote a commonality of culture over its plurality, ultimately an impossible task. Similarly, for the newly emerging groups who lived off trade and the use of 'capital', being tied down to a specific pressure group or social hierarchy could act as an obstacle to the execution of their vocation. Wealth at least was always regarded as of universal substance and the merchant's quest for wealth was analogous in its lack of boundaries to the Buddhist quest, even if it was totally different in content.

Focusing on the relationship between emergent Buddhism and the non-religious elites in northeast India of the sixth to second centuries BCE raises a conundrum encountered constantly in our work. Was the emergence of Buddhism a response to the substantive changes that appear to have occurred by the time the Buddha became active as a holy man or was it in some way complicit in the historical forces and the subsequent justification, primarily by the elite groups of society, of the direction of historical change? Or was it both? Responses to radical and sustained change are many, ranging along the entire gamut from outright refusal to adapt, to an attitude – practised in a wholly opportunistic way – of on-going adjustment to the perceived changes. In stressing the practical application of a rigorous path, requiring the adoption of an uncompromising form of asceticism, Buddhist teaching sought to place its adepts in a constancy operating outside of change as this was perceived in the 'secular' world.

To respond to the conundrum by adopting either of these positions as providing the privileged hermeneutical guide is of course far too simplistic when dealing with a highly complex cultural phenomenon like Buddhism. On the basis of all the evidence at our disposal we still cannot say with certainty why the Buddha felt inspired to develop a highly original message about the nature of existence, one emphasizing the centrality of dukkha, always a deceptively difficult word to comprehend. It is true that the early texts allow inferences to be made about the social environment in which the Buddha and the first members of the Order made their mark; yet we are constrained only to know of the reaction of these figures to their immediate historical context. And, as part of this, we are provided with no firm evidence as to what specific (whether particular events or memories of rapid and comprehensive change) material, social or political conditions impelled the Buddha to develop such a rigorously consistent doctrine of dukkha. Had he had direct experience of large-scale displacement brought about by the political and economic factors that impressed themselves upon his sensitive mind? And did this experience, in conjunction with the perception of the apparent arbitrariness associated with death and disease, lead to this exposition of metaphysical doctrine asserting the omnipresence and interrelation of dukkha and change?

Or was it more likely that – as we have consistently argued – the economy was in a stage of steady growth during the Buddha's lifetime, pressure on land use was minimal and cultural plurality, though not political independence, still tolerated? In such an environment the elite speculate on the impossibility of material wealth and psychological security precluding the certainty of death and focus instead on the juxtaposition between all forms of distress, personal and social, in the midst of flourishing material conditions. To state the obvious, the texts do not enable us convincingly to confirm or deny this assertion, nor does the archaeological evidence.

What we must be fully confident in asserting is that the early Buddhist Order of monks and nuns had emerged and developed in the new urbanism, with all the other changes accompanying this, without showing much awareness of an immediately prior historical situation – unless we exclude the idealized reflections on the condition of the 'brahmins of old', asserted as a role model for right behaviour in the Buddha's time. That is, early Buddhism developed as a consequence of a changed situation, rather than of a rapidly changing one. Arguments about repressed memories of earlier situations lack substance because there exists neither implicit nor explicit textual evidence to support them. This aside, the development of the renunciatory life was just one response to a heightened recognition of substantially changed living conditions. If Buddhism had not developed as an institution, as opposed to a loosely grouped set of individuals, it would have had to foster the development of its own opposite – a lay body which identified itself as Buddhist by following particular ethical precepts, venerating the Buddha and materially supporting monks. At the same time this lay body must have continued to worship Hindu gods and immersed itself in the economic order of the day with all that that life entailed.

The need to accommodate a lay following meant there would always be several Buddhisms. If this promotes a picture of plurality, how much more the different emphases within monastic Buddhism where we can most easily distinguish the fund-raising parish priest from the meditator in the monastery and the forest-dwelling ascetic. Plurality becomes more and more reified the longer the institution of Buddhism flourishes and survives.

An inevitable consequence of the successful growth of Buddhism by Aśoka's time was the noticing of this growth in all of its manifestations by others who would have considered the Buddhists as potential rivals. Of these rivals the brahmins were the most significant. Certainly, the Buddhist texts, with their extensive portrayal of the often humorous interaction between Buddhist monks and brahmins, have a vested interest in creating an impression of concern by the brahmins. Always the latter are depicted in various postures of defeat, and potential humiliation, at the hands of their Buddhist antagonists. Yet we might well see such a picture as being entirely subjective, painted as it is from the Buddhist perspective.

Hindu evidence of brāhmaṇical sensitivity to on-going rivalry from Buddhist and other śramaṇic sects comes primarily from the Mahābhārata.¹ An integral part of its plot is taken up with the destructive and bloody revenge warrior brahmins take against the entire class of kṣatriyas, from whom the kings were recruited. On one reading this theme enshrines a brahmin reaction against the development of a polity where brāhmaṇical values are no longer being regarded by the rulers as hegemonic. From the brahmin point of view, their class needed to do more than just survive as one body of opinion jostling with several others; it had always to be primus inter pares. Its attack then was directed not so much against the Buddhists as against those supposedly Hindu kings who did not utterly privilege the brahmins, ¹ Our thinking on this subject has been substantially influenced by the continuing work of Professor Jim Fitzgerald of the University of Tennessee.

but offered largesse more widely. Thus the very extensive satirization of the brahmin, as both a class and a cultural position, in the Pāli Canon, has its direct reflex in the Mahābhārata where a class believing themselves dispossessed use a literary instrument – the epic itself – to fight back. The emerging Hinduism, dominated by a brāhmaṇical codification of society and religion within the frame of brahmin self-interest, saw the brahmins thriving on the cultural integration of a politically fractured society (which ultimately became the norm in India where political fracturing has been the norm). Buddhism, on the other hand, thrived on the ideological integration of a culturally diverse fragmented society subject to political and economic expansion.

Bibliography

BOOKS IN INDIC LANGUAGES

- Anguttara Nikāya*, ed. Morris, R. and Hardy, E. (6 vols, PTS, London, 1958–76 (1885–1910)).
- Atharva Veda*, ed. Roth, R. and Whitney, W. D. (Berlin, 1855).
- Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum, Vol. 1 Inscriptions of Asoka*, new edn ed. Hultzsch, E. (Indological Book House, Delhi and Varanasi, 1969). Original edn: Inscriptions of Asoka (Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1925).
- Dhammapada*, eds and trans. Carter, J. R. and Palihawadana, M. (Oxford University Press, New York, 1987).
- Dhammapada*, ed. von Hinüber, O. and Norman, K. R. (PTS, Oxford, 1995).
- Dharmasūtras: the law codes of Āpastamba, Gautama, Baudhāyana, and Vasiṣṭha. Annotated text and translation*, Olivelle, P. (Motilal Banarsidass, New Delhi, 2000).
- Dīgha Nikāya*, ed. Rhys Davids, T. W. and Carpenter, J. E. (3 vols, PTS, London, 1960–7 (1890–1911)).
- Divyāvadana*, ed. Cowell, E. B. and Neil, A. (Oriental Press, Amsterdam, 1970 (Cambridge, 1886)).
- The Early Upanishads: annotated text and translation*, trans. and ed. Olivelle, P. (Oxford University Press, New York, 1998).
- Eighteen Principal Upaniṣads*, ed. Limaye, V. P. and Vadekar, R. D. (Vaidika Samsodhana Mandala, Poona, 1958).
- Jātaka*, ed. Fausböll, V. (6 vols, PTS, London, 1962–4 (1887–97)).
- Kātyāyanasmṛti or Vyavahāra, law and procedure*, ed. [reconstructed] and trans. Kane, P. V. (Bombay, 1933; reprinted from Hindu Law Journal).
- The Kauṭīliya Arthaśāstra: A critical edition with a glossary*, ed. and trans. Kangle, R. P. (3 vols, University of Bombay, Bombay, 1969–72).
- Mahābhārata*, ed. Sukthankar, V. S. et al. (19 vols, BORI, Poona, 1933–66).
- Majjhima Nikāya*, ed. Trenckner, V., Chalmers, R. and Rhys Davids, C. A. F. (4 vols. PTS, London, 1960–74 (1888–1925)).
- Digital version produced by the International Buddhist Research and Information Center.
- The Milindapañho*, ed. Trenckner, V. (Luzac, London, 1962 (1880)).

- Patañjali, Mahābhāṣya. Vyākaraṇamahābhāṣyam Kilbornnamna*, ed. Kielhorn, F., rev. Abhyankar, K. V. (Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Poona, 1962–5).
- Samyutta Nikāya*, ed. Feer, L. (6 vols, PTS, London, 1960–75 (1884–1904)).
- Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa*, ed. Weber, A. (Benares, 1964 (Berlin, 1855)).
- Sutta-nipāta*, ed. Andersen, D. and Smith, H. (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1984 (1913)).
- Udāna*, ed. Steinthal, P. (Routledge & Kegan Paul (for the PTS), London, 1982 (1885)).
- Vinaya Piṭaka*, ed. Oldenberg, H. and Pischel, R. (5 vols, PTS, London, 1929 (1879–83)).
- The Vyākaraṇa-Mahābhāṣya of Patañjali*, ed. Kielhorn, F. (3 vols. Osnabrück, 1970 (1880)).

BOOKS AND ARTICLES IN EUROPEAN LANGUAGES

- Acharya, P. K. Architecture of Mānasāra (Oxford University Press, London, 1934; reprint: Oriental Books Reprint Corp., Delhi, 1980).
- Agrawal, D. P. and Kusumgar, S. Prehistoric Chronology and Radiocarbon Dating in India (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1972).
- Ali, D. 'Technologies of the self: courtly artifice and monastic discipline in early India', JESHO, 41 (1998), pp. 159–84.
- Allchin, B. and Allchin, F. R. The Rise of Civilization in India and Pakistan (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1982).
- Allchin, F. R. 'City and state formation in early historic South Asia, I', South Asian Studies, 5 (1989), pp. 1–16.
- Allchin, F. R. (ed.). The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995).
- Amore, R. C. The Concept and Practice of Doing Merit in Early Theravāda Buddhism (University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Xerox, 1971).
- Auboyer, J. Le trône et son symbolisme dans l'Inde ancienne (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1949).
- Bailey, G. Materials for the Study of Ancient Indian Ideologies: Pravṛtti and Nivṛtti (Pubblicazioni di Indologica Taurinensia, Turin, 1985).
- 'The semantics of bhakti in the Vāmana Purāṇa', Rivista degli Studi Orientali, 62 (1988), pp. 25–57.
- 'Problems of the interpretation of the data pertaining to religious interaction in ancient India: the conversion stories in the Sutta Nipāta', Indo-British Review, 19 (1991), pp. 1–20.
- 'Max Weber's Hinduism und Buddhismus: a new interpretation', paper contributed to Max Weber, Religion and Social Action, conference in Canberra, September 1999.
- Bajpai, R. Society in the 7th Century (Chand, Delhi, 1992).
- Bapat, P. V. 'Dhutangas (or the ascetic practices of purification in Buddhism)', Indian Historical Quarterly, 13 (1937), pp. 44–51.

- Bareau, A. 'Les réactions des familles dont un membre devient moine selon le canon bouddhique pali', in Wijesekara, O. H. de A. (ed.), Malalasekara Commemoration Volume (The Malalasekara Commemoration Volume Editorial Committee, Colombo, 1976), pp. 15–22.
- 'Le Buddha et les rois', Bulletin De L'École Française D'Extrême-Orient, 80/1 (1993), pp. 15–39.
- Barth, F. 'Ecological relationships of ethnic groups in Swat, North Pakistan', American Anthropologist, 58 (1956), pp. 1079–89.
- Barth, F. (ed.). Ethnic Groups and Boundaries (Little, Brown, Boston, 1969).
- Basham, A. L. History and Doctrine of the Ājīvikas: A Vanished Indian Religion (Luzac, London, 1951).
- 'The background to the rise of Buddhism', in Narain, A. K. (ed.), Studies in History (B.R. Publishing, Delhi, 1980), pp. 13–32.
- Beaujeu-Garnier, J. Geography of Population, trans. Beaver, S. H. (Longman, London, 1966).
- Béteille, A. 'On the concept of tribe', International Social Science Journal, 32 (1980), pp. 825–8.
- Biardeau, M. and Malamoud, C. La Sacrifice dans L'Inde Ancienne (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1976).
- Blackburn, A. 'Looking for the Vinaya: monastic discipline in the practical canons of the Theravada', JIAS, 22 (1999), pp. 281–309.
- Bloch, J. Les Inscriptions d'Asoka, traduites et commentées (Société d'édition 'Les Belles Lettres', Paris, 1950).
- Bodhi, Bhikkhu. The Connected Discourses of the Buddha: A New Translation of the Saṃyutta Nikāya (2 vols, Wisdom Publications, Boston, 2000).
- Bond, G. Review of J. R. Carter and M. Palihawadana, Dhammapada, JAOS, 111 (1991), p. 173.
- Bongard-Levin, G. M. Mauryan India (Sterling, New Delhi, 1985).
- Brekke, T. 'The early saṅgha and the laity', JIAS, 20/2 (1997), pp. 28–9.
- 'Contradiction and the merit of giving in Indian religions', Numen, 45 (1998), pp. 287–320.
- Bronkhorst, J. The Two Traditions of Meditation in Ancient India (Steiner, Stuttgart, 1986).
- Brown, P. 'The rise and function of the holy man in late antiquity', in Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity (Faber and Faber, London, 1982), pp. 103–52.
- Authority and the Sacred. Aspects of the Christianisation of the Roman World* (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995).
- Brucker, E. Die Spätvedische Kulturepoche nach den Quellen der Śrauta-, Grhya und Dharmasūtras. Der Siedlungsraum (Steiner, Wiesbaden, 1980).
- Bühler, G. 'The Bhattiprolu inscriptions', Epigraphica Indica, II (1894), pp. 323–9.
- Burlingame, E. W. (trans.), Buddhist Legends. Translated from the original Pāli Text of the Dhammapada Commentary (Luzac, London, 1969 (Cambridge, Mass., 1921)).
- Caillat, C. 'Asoka et les gens de la brousse (XIII M-N)', Bulletin des Etudes Indiennes, 9 (1991), pp. 9–13.

- Caritthers, M. Review of S. J. Tambiah, World Conqueror, World Renouncer, Journal of the Anthropological Society of Oxford, 8 (1977), pp. 95–105.
The Buddha (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1983).
- Carter, J. R. and Palihawadana, M. (eds and trans.). Dhammapada (Oxford University Press, New York, 1987).
- Chakrabarti, D. K. 'The beginning of iron in India', Antiquity, 50 (1976), pp. 114–24.
 'Iron and urbanization: an examination of the Indian context', Purātattva 15 (1984–5), pp. 68–74.
- Chakravarti, U. The Social Dimensions of Early Buddhism (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1987).
- Chattopadhyaya, B. D. 'The city in early India: perspectives from texts', Studies in History, 13/2 NS (1997), pp. 181–208.
- Chattopadhyaya, D. P. Lokāyata. A study in ancient Indian materialism (People's Publishing House, Delhi, 1959/1973).
- Chutintaranond, S. "Mandala", "Segmentary State" and the politics of centralization in medieval Ayudhya', Journal of the Siam Society, 78 (1990), pp. 89–100.
- Collins, S. Selfless Persons: Imagery and Thought in Theravāda Buddhism (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1982).
 'The Discourse on What is Primary (Aggañña-Sutta). An annotated translation', Journal of Indian Philosophy, 21 (1993), pp. 301–95.
- Coningham, R. A. E. 'Dark Age or Continuum', in F. R. Allchin (ed.), The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995), pp. 54–72.
- Coomaraswamy, A. K. Yakṣas (2 parts, Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1971).
- Cribb, J. 'Dating India's earliest coins', in Schotsmans, J. and Taddei, M. (eds.), South Asian Archaeology 1983 (2 vols, Istituto Universitario Orientale, Naples, 1985), pp. 535–54.
- Dehejia, V. 'The collective and popular basis of early Buddhist patronage: sacred monuments, 100BC–AD250', in Stoler Miller, B. (ed.), The Powers of Art. Patronage in Indian Culture (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1992).
- de Jong, J. W. 'The background of early Buddhism', Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies, 12 (1964), pp. 34–47.
 Review of M. Kloppenborg, The Paccekabuddha: a Buddhist Ascetic, IJ, 18 (1976), pp. 322–4.
 Review of R. Gombrich, Theravāda Buddhism, IJ, 32 (1989), p. 241.
- Deloche, J. La Circulation en Inde, avant la Révolution des Transports (2 vols, École Française D'Extrême-Orient, Paris, 1980).
- Despres, L. A. (ed.). Ethnicity and Resource Competition in Plural Societies (Mouton, The Hague/Paris, 1975).
- Douglas, M. Purity and Danger: an analysis of concepts of pollution and taboo (Routledge and Kegan Paul, London, 1966).
Natural Symbols: explorations in cosmology (Penguin, Harmondsworth, 1973).
- Drekmeier, C. Kingship and Community in Early India (Stanford University Press, Stanford, 1962).

- Dumont, L. Homo Hierarchicus (Paladin, London, 1966).
- Durkheim, E. The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, trans. Swain, J. W. (Free Press, New York, 1965).
- Dutt, S. Early Buddhist Monachism (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1984 (London, 1924)).
- Erdosy, G. 'Origins of cities in the Ganges valley', JESHO, 28 (1985), pp. 81–109.
 'Early historic cities of northern India', South Asian Studies, 3 (1987), pp. 1–23.
 'City states of North India and Pakistan at the time of the Buddha', in Allchin, F. R. (ed.), The Archaeology of Early Historic South Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995), pp. 99–122.
- Erndl, K. Victory to the Mother: the Hindu Goddess of Northwest India in Myth, Ritual and Symbol (Oxford University Press, New York, 1993).
- Ernfors, E. B. and Ernfors, R. F. Archaic Economy and Modern Society (Studia Sociologica Upsaliensia 31, Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, Uppsala, 1990).
- Falk, N. 'Wilderness and kingship in ancient South Asia', HR, 13 (1974), pp. 1–15.
- Fausbøll, V. Sutta Nipāta (Sacred Books of the East, vol. x, Oxford, 1881).
- Fick, R. Die Soziale Gliederung in Nordöstlichen Indien zu Buddhas Zeit (Kiel, 1897).
- Friedrich-Silber, I. Virtuosity, Charisma, and Social Order: a comparative sociological study of monasticism in Theravada Buddhism and medieval Catholicism, (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1995).
- Geertz, C. 'Religion as a cultural system', in The Interpretation of Cultures (Basic Books, New York, 1973), pp. 87–125.
- Gethin, R. 'Cosmology and meditation: from the Aggañña Sutta to the Mahāyāna', HR, 36 (1997), pp. 183–217.
- Ghosh, A. The City in Early Historical India (Institute of Advanced Study, Simla, 1973).
- Glover, I. Early Trade between India and Southeast Asia (Centre for Southeast Asian Studies, University of Hull, Hull, 1990).
- Gokhale, B. G. 'The Buddhist social ideals', Indian Historical Quarterly, 32 (1957), pp. 141–7.
 'The early Buddhist elite', Journal of Indian History, 42 (1965), pp. 391–402.
 'Early Buddhist kingship', Journal of Asian Studies, 26 (1966), pp. 15–22.
 'The merchant in ancient India', Journal of the American Oriental Society, 97 (1977), pp. 125–30.
 'Early Buddhism and the urban revolution', JIAS, 5/2 (1982), pp. 7–22.
- Gombrich, R. Precept and Practice. Traditional Buddhism in the Rural Highlands of Ceylon (Oxford University Press, London, 1971).
- 'Karma and social control', Comparative Studies in Society and History, 17 (1975), pp. 212–20.
- Theravāda Buddhism. A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo* (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1988).
- 'How the Mahāyāna began', Journal of Pali and Buddhist Studies, 1 (1988), pp. 29–46; reprinted in Skorupski, T. (ed.), The Buddhist Forum: Seminar Papers 1987–88, Volume 1 (School of Oriental and African Studies, London, 1990), pp. 5–20.

- Granoff, P. 'The ambiguity of miracles. Buddhist understandings of supernatural power', East and West, 46 (1996), pp. 79–96.
- Gupta, S. P. 'Two urbanizations in India: a side study in their social structure', Purātattva, 7 (1974), pp. 53–60.
- Harris, M. Cultural Materialism: the struggle for a science of culture (Random House, New York, 1979).
- Heesterman, J. C. 'Was there an Indian reaction? Western expansion in Indian perspective', in H. Wesseling (ed.), Expansion and Reaction: Essays on European Expansion and Reaction in Asia and Africa (Leiden University Press, Leiden, 1978), pp. 31–58.
- Heitzman, J. 'Early Buddhism, trade and empire', in Kennedy, K. A. R. and Possehl, Gregory L. (eds), Studies in the Archeology and Paleoanthropology of South Asia (Oxford and IBH Publishing Co., New Delhi, 1984), pp. 121–37.
- Hodder, I. 'Economic and social stress and material cultural patterning', American Antiquity, 44 (1979), p. 446–54.
- Horner, I. B. The Book of the Discipline (6 vols, Luzac & Co. (PTS), London, 1938).
- Indian Archaeology – A Review* (Archaeological Survey of India, Delhi, 1957–8, 1982–3, 1984–5, 1986–7, 1989–90).
- Jamison, S. W. Sacrificed Wife. Sacrificer's Wife (Oxford University Press, New York, 1996).
- Jayawickrame, N. A. Analysis of the Sutta Nipāta. A critical analysis of the Pāli Sutta Nipāta illustrating its gradual growth (London, unpublished PhD thesis, 1947).
- Jones, S. 'Discourses of identity in the interpretation of the past', in Graves-Brown, P., Jones S. and Gamble C. (eds), Cultural Identity and Archeology: the Construction of European Communities (Routledge, London and New York, 1996), pp. 62–80.
- The Archeology of Ethnicity: Constructing Identities in the Past and Present* (Routledge, London and New York, 1997).
- Kaelber, W. O. 'Tapas, birth and spiritual rebirth in the Veda', HR, 15 (1976), pp. 343–86.
- Kahane, R. 'Priesthood and social change: the case of the brahmins', Religion, 11 (1981), pp. 353–66.
- King, A. 'Some archaeological problems regarding Gangetic culture', in Kennedy, K. A. R. and Possehl, Gregory L. (eds), Studies in the Archeology and Paleoanthropology of South Asia (Oxford and IBH Publishing Co., New Delhi, 1984), p. 109–19.
- Kirfel, W. Die Kosmographie der Inder (Georg Olms, Hildesheim, 1967 (Bonn and Leipzig, 1920)).
- Kloppenborg, M. The Paccekabuddha: a Buddhist Ascetic (E. J. Brill, Leiden, 1974).
- Knox, R. Amaravati: Buddhist Sculpture from the Great Stupa (British Museum, London, 1992).
- Kölver, B. 'Kauṭalyas Stadt als Handelzentrum: der Terminus puṭabhedana', ZDMG, 135 (1985), pp. 299–311.

- Kosambi, D. D. 'Early stages of the caste system in northern India', Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 22 (1946), pp. 33–48.
- 'Ancient Kosala and Magadha', Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, 27, 1952, p. 183.
- An Introduction to the Study of Ancient Indian History* (Popular Book Depot, Bombay, 1956).
- 'The beginnings of the iron age in India', Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient, 7 (1963), pp. 309–18.
- Kuiper, F. B. J. Varuṇa and Vidūṣaka. On the Origin of the Sanskrit Drama (North Holland, Amsterdam, 1979).
- Kulke, H. Jagannātha-Kult und Gajapati-Königtum (Steiner, Wiesbaden, 1979).
- 'Indian colonies, Indianization or cultural convergence?', in H. Schulte Nordholt, H. (ed.), Onderzoek in Zuidoost Azië (Rijksuniversiteit de Leiden, Leiden, 1990), pp. 8–32.
- 'Grāmakāma – "das verlangen nach einem Dorf". Überlegungen zum Beginn frühstaatlicher Entwicklung im vedischen Indien', Saeculum, 42 (1991), pp. 111–28.
- 'THE RĀJASŪYA. A paradigm of early state formation', in Van Den Hoek, A. W., Kolff, D. H. A. and Oort, M. S. (eds), Ritual, State and History in South Asia. Essays in Honour of J. C. Heesterman (E. J. Brill, Leiden, 1992), pp. 188–98.
- Lal, B. B. 'The two Indian epics vis-à-vis archaeology', Antiquity, 50 (1981), pp. 27–34.
- Lal, M. Archaeology of Population: A Study of Population Change in the Ganga-Yamuna Doab from 2nd Millennium B.C. to the Present (Dept of Ancient Indian History, Culture and Archaeology, Banaras Hindu University, Varanasi, 1984).
- Settlement History and Rise of Civilization in Ganga-Yamuna Doab, from 1500 B.C. to 300 A.D.* (B.R. Publishing, Delhi, 1984).
- 'The stages of human colonization of the Ganga-Yamuna doab: archaeological evidence', South Asian Studies, 3 (1987), pp. 25–32.
- 'Population distribution and its movement during the second–first millennium B.C. in the Indo-Gangetic divide and Upper Ganga plain', Purātattva, 18 (1987–8), pp. 35–53.
- Lamotte, E. 'La légende du Buddha', Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, 134 (1946), pp. 37–71.
- 'Introduction à l'étude du bouddhisme de Śakyamuni d'après les textes anciens', Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen I: Philologisch-Historische Klasse, 1983, pp. 83–120.
- Law, B. C. Geography of Early Buddhism (Bharatiya Publishing, Varanasi, 1973 (K. Paul, Trench, Trubner, London, 1932)).
- Lewis, I. T. 'Newar-Tibetan trade and the domestication of the Simhalasārtha-bāhu Avadāna', HR, 33 (1993), pp. 1–35.
- Mabbett, I. W. Truth, Myth and Politics in Ancient India (Thomson Press, Delhi, 1971).
- 'The symbolism of Mount Meru', HR, 23 (1983), pp. 64–83.

- 'Weber, Protestantism and Buddhism', paper contributed to Max Weber, Religion and Social Action, conference in Canberra, September 1999.
- 'The rise of Buddhism in a period of urbanization and state formation', Aichi Bunkyo Review, 4 (2001), pp. 35–59.
- 'The early Buddhist Samgha in its social context', Nagoya Studies in Indian Culture and Buddhism: Sambhāṣā, 21 (2001), 101–29.
- 'Buddhism and freedom', in Kelly, D. and Reid, A. J. S. (eds.), Asian Freedoms. The Idea of Freedom in East and Southeast Asia (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1998), pp. 19–36.
- McCrinkle, J. W. Ancient India as Described in Classical Literature (Philo, Amsterdam, 1971).
- McNeill, W. Plagues and Peoples (Anchor, New York, 1976).
- Majumdar, R. C. Classical Accounts of India, Being a Compilation of the English Translations of the Accounts Left by Herodotus, Megasthenes... (Mukhopadhyay, Calcutta, 1960).
- Malalasekara, G. P. Dictionary of Pāli Proper Names (2 vols, published for the PTS by Luzac, London, 1960).
- Malamoud, C. 'Village et forêt dans l'idéologie de l'Inde brāhmaṇique', Archives Européennes de Sociologie, 17 (1976), pp. 3–20.
- Marasinghe, M. M. Gods in Early Buddhism: a study in their social and mythological milieu as depicted in the Nikāyas of the Pali Canon (University of Sri Lanka Press, Vidyalandara, 1974).
- Masefield, P. Divine Revelation in Pali Buddhism (Allen & Unwin, London, 1986).
- 'Mind/Cosmos maps in the Pāli Nikāyas', in Katz, N. (ed.), Buddhist and Western Psychology (Prajñā Press, Boulder, 1983), pp. 69–93.
- 'The pursuit of merit: sacrificial devotion in the Pāli Nikāyas', in Bailey, G. M. and Kesarcodi-Watson, I. (eds), Bhakti Studies (Sterling, New Delhi, 1992), pp. 292–308.
- Masson, J. La religion populaire dans le canon Bouddhique Pāli (Muséon, Louvain, 1942).
- Mayrhofer, M. Kurzgefasstes etymologisches Wörterbuch des Altindischen (4 vols, Winter, Heidelberg, 1953–75).
- Milner, M. Status and Sacredness. A General Theory of Status Relations and an Analysis of Indian Culture (Oxford University Press, New York, 1994).
- Misra, G. S. P. The Age of Vinaya (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1972).
- Mizuno, K. 'A comparative study of Dharmapadas', in Dhammapala, G., Gombrich, R. and Norman, K. R. (eds), Buddhist Studies in Honour of Hammalava Saddhātissa (Buddhist Research Library Trust, Nugegoda, 1984), pp. 168–75.
- Moore, E. Moated Sites in Early North East Thailand (British Archaeological Reports, Oxford, 1988).
- Morrison, K. 'Trade, urbanism and agricultural expansion: Buddhist monastic institutions and the state in early historic western Deccan', World Archeology, 27 (1995), pp. 203–21.
- Mourer, R. 'Préhistoire du Cambodge', Archéologia, 23 (1988), pp. 40–52.

- Mus, P. India Seen from the East (Centre for South East Asian Studies, Clayton, Victoria, 1975).
- Narain, A. K. and Roy, T. N. Excavations at Rājghāt (Benares Hindu University Press, Varanasi, 1976).
- Norman, K. R. 'A note on Attā in the Alagaddupama Sutta', in Studies in Indian Philosophy. A Memorial Volume in Honour of Pt Sukhlalji Sanghvi (LD Institute of Indology, Ahmedabad, 1981), pp. 19–29.
- Pāli Literature, Including the Canonical Literature in Prakrit and Sanskrit of All the Hinayāna Schools of Buddhism* (Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, 1983).
- The Group of Discourses (Sutta-Nipāta) Volume II. Revised Translation* (PTS, Oxford, 1992).
- Nyanatiloka Bhikkhu (ed.). Buddhist Dictionary: manual of Buddhist terms and doctrines (3rd edn, Frewin, Colombo, 1972).
- Obeyesekere, G. 'Theodicy, sin and salvation in the sociology of religion', in Leach, E. R. (ed.), Dialectic in Practical Religion (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1968).
- O'Connor, R. 'Agricultural change and ethnic succession in Southeast Asian states: a case for regional anthropology', Journal of Asian Studies, 54 (1995), pp. 968–96.
- Oguibene, B. 'From a Vedic ritual to the Buddhist practice of initiation into the doctrine', in Denwood, P. and Piatigorsky, A. (eds), Buddhist Studies Ancient and Modern (Curzon Press, London, 1983), pp. 107–23.
- Olivelle, P. Samnyāsa Upaniṣads: Hindu Scriptures on Asceticism and Renunciation (Oxford University Press, New York, 1992).
- The Āśrama System* (Oxford University Press, New York, 1993).
- Pande, G. C. Studies in the Origins of Buddhism (Motilal Banarsidass, Delhi, 1974 (Department of Ancient History, Culture and Archeology, University of Allahabad, 1957)).
- Parpola, A. 'The coming of the Aryans to Iran and India and the cultural and ethnic identity of the Dāsas', Studia Orientalia, 64 (1988), pp. 195–302.
- Pearson, H. W. 'The economy has no surplus: critique of a theory of development', in Polanyi, K., Arensberg, C. M. and Pearson, H. W. (eds), Trade and Market in the Early Empires (Free Press, New York, 1957), pp. 320–41.
- Pleiner, R. 'The problem of the beginning of the iron age in India', Acta Praehistorica et Archaeologica, 2 (1971), pp. 5–36.
- Polanyi, K., Arensberg, C. M. and Pearson, H. W. (eds). Trade and Market in the Early Empires (Free Press, New York, 1957).
- Prebish, C. 'Ideal types in Indian Buddhism: a new paradigm', JAOS, 115 (1995), pp. 651–66.
- Quigley, D. 'Is a theory of caste still possible?', in Searle-Chatterjee, M. and Sharma, U. (eds), Contextualising Caste: post-Dumontian approaches (Blackwell, Oxford and Sociological Review, Cambridge, Mass., 1994), pp. 54–72.
- Rahula, W. 'Humour in Pali literature', Journal of the Pali Text Society, 9 (1981), pp. 156–74.

- Rau, W. Staat und Gesellschaft Im Alten Indien Nach Den Brähmanatexten Dargestellt (Harrassowitz, Wiesbaden, 1957).
Zur vedischen Altertumskunde (Akademie der Wissenschaft und der Literatur, Mainz, 1983).
- Rawlinson, A. 'Nāgas and the magical cosmology of Buddhism', Religion, 16 (1986), pp. 135–53.
- Ray, A. Villages, Towns and Secular Buildings in Ancient India (Firma K. L. Mukhopadhyaya, Calcutta, 1964).
- Ray, H. P. Monastery and Guild. Commerce under the Sātavāhanas (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1986).
The Winds of Change: Buddhism and the maritime links of early South Asia (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1994).
 'Trade and contacts', in Thapar, R. (ed.), Recent Perspectives of Early Indian History (Popular Prakashan, Bombay, 1995), pp. 142–75.
- Ray, N. 'Technology and social change', Purātattva, 8 (1975–6), pp. 132–8.
- Ray, R. Buddhist Saints in India (Oxford University Press, New York, 1994).
- Renou, L. Etudes Védiques et Pāninéennes (19 vols, Boccard, Paris, 1956).
- Reynolds, F. 'The two wheels of Dharma: a study of early Buddhism,' in Obeyesekere, G., Reynolds, F. and Smith, B. L., The Two Wheels of Dharma: Essays on the Theravāda Tradition in India and Ceylon (The American Academy of Religion, Chambersburg, Pa. 1972), pp. 6–30.
- Rhys Davids, T. W. Buddhist India (T. Fisher Unwin, London, 1903; 8th edn: Susil Gupta (India) Private, Calcutta, 1959).
- Rhys Davids, T. W. and Oldenberg, H. 'Introduction to the Vinaya' (Sacred Books of the East, vol. XIII, Oxford, 1881).
- Rhys Davids, T. W. and Stede, W. The Pali Text Society's Pali-English Dictionary (PTS, London, 1972 (1921–5)).
- Ritschl, E. 'Brahmanische Bauern. Zur Theorie und Praxis der brahmanischen Ständeordnung im alten Indien', Altorientalische Forschungen, 7 (1980), pp. 177–87.
- Roth, G. 'Text of the Patna Dharmapada', in Bechert, H. (ed.), Die Sprache der ältesten buddhistischen Überlieferung: the Language of the Earliest Buddhist Tradition (Vandenhoek and Ruprecht, Göttingen, 1980), pp. 97–135.
Dialogues of the Buddha (3 vols, Luzac, London, 1956–66 (Oxford University Press, London, 1899–1921)).
- Russell, J. C. Medieval Regions and their Cities (Indiana University Press, Bloomington, 1972).
- Ryan, J. D. 'The Civakacintamani in Historical Perspective' (unpublished thesis, University of California, Berkeley, 1985).
- Sakurai, Y. 'Tank agriculture in South India: an essay on agricultural Indianization in Southeast Asia', in Jayawardena, S. D. G. (ed.), Transformation of the Agricultural Landscape in Sri Lanka and South India (Kyoto University Centre for Southeast Asian Studies, Kyoto, n.d.), pp. 117–58.
- Samuel, G. Civilized Shamans (Smithsonian Institute Press, Washington and London, 1993).

- Samuels, J. 'Views of householders and lay disciples in the Sutta Piṭaka: a reconsideration of the lay/monastic opposition', Religion, 29 (1999), pp. 231–41.
- Sankalia, H. D., Ansari, Z. D. and Dhavalikar, M. K. 'Excavations at the early farming village of Inamgaon, 1968–82', in Lukacs, J. (ed.), The Peoples of South Asia. The Biological Anthropology of India, Pakistan, and Nepal (Plenum Press, New York and London, 1984), pp. 91–103.
- Sarao, K. T. The Origin and Nature of Ancient Indian Buddhism (Eastern Book Linkers, Delhi, 1989).
- Sarkisyanz, E. Buddhist Backgrounds of the Burmese Revolution (Nijhoff, The Hague, 1965).
- Urban Centres and Urbanisation as Reflected in the Pāli Vinaya and Sutta Piṭakas* (Vidyānidhi, Delhi, 1990).
- Schopen, G. 'Two problems in the history of Indian Buddhism: the layman/monk distinction and the doctrines of the transference of merit', Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik, 10 (1985), pp. 9–47.
- 'Burial ad sanctos and the physical presence of the Buddha in early Indian Buddhism: a study in the archeology of religions', Religion, 17 (1987), pp. 193–225.
- 'Doing business for the Lord: lending on interest and written loan contracts in the Mūlasarvāstivādinaya', JAOS, 114 (1994), pp. 527–54.
- 'Monastic law meets the real world: a monk's continuing right to inherit family property in classical India', HR, 35 (1996), pp. 101–23.
- Searle-Chatterjee, M. 'Caste, religion and other identities', in Searle-Chatterjee, M. and Sharma, U. (eds), Contextualising Caste: Post-Dumontian Approaches (Blackwell, Oxford, 1994), pp. 147–66.
- Shaffer, J. 'Bronze age iron from Afghanistan', in Kennedy, K. A. R. and Possehl, Gregory L., Studies in the Archeology and Paleoanthropology of South Asia (Oxford and IBH Publishing Co., New Delhi, 1984), pp. 41–62.
- Sharan, M. K. 'Origin of republics in India with special reference to the Yaudheya tribe', in Mukherjee, B. N. et al., (eds), Sri Dinesacandrika – Studies in Indologie. Shri D. C. Sircar Festschrift (Sundeep Prakashan, 1983), pp. 241–52.
- Sharma, J. P. Republics in Ancient India 1500 B.C. to 500 B.C. (Brill, Leiden, 1968).
- Sharma, R. S. Light on Early Indian Society and Economy (Manaktalas, Bombay, 1966).
- Material Culture and Social Formations in Ancient India* (Macmillan India, Delhi, 1983).
- 'Trends in the economic history of Mathurā (c.300 B.C.–A.D. 300)', in Srinivasan, D. M. (ed.), Mathurā. The Cultural Heritage (Manohar, American Institute of Indian Studies, New Delhi, 1989), pp. 31–8.
- Sinha, A. K. 'The historical urbanization – a suggestive date', Purātattva, 11 (1979–80), pp. 151–5.
- Sjoberg, G. 'The rise and fall of cities', International Journal of Comparative Sociology, 4 (1963), pp. 107–20.
- Smith, G. Classifying the Universe. The Ancient Indian Varna System and the Origins of Caste (Oxford University Press, New York, 1994).

- Southwold, M. Buddhism in Life: the anthropological study of religion and the Sinhalese practice of Buddhism (Manchester University Press, Manchester, 1983).
- Spiro, M. 'Buddhism and economic action in Burma', American Anthropologist, 68 (1966), pp. 1163-73.
- Buddhism and Society: a Great Tradition and its Burmese Vicissitudes* (Harper and Row, New York, 1970).
- Sprockhoff, J. F. 'Āraṇyaka und Vanaprastha in der vedische Literatur', WZKSA, 25 (1981), pp. 19-90.
- Stein, B. 'Formation of the medieval agrarian order: brahman and peasant in early South Indian history', in Peasant, State and Society in Medieval South India (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1980/1994), pp. 63-89.
- Strenski, I. 'On generalized exchange and the domestication of the sangha', MAN, ns. 18 (1983), pp. 463-77.
- Tambiah, S. J. World Conqueror and World Renouncer: a study of Buddhism and polity in Thailand against a historical background (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 1976).
- Tate, A. The Autobiography of a Forest Monk (Wat Hin Mark Peng, Chiang Mai, Thailand, 1993).
- Tatia, N. 'The interaction of Jainism and Buddhism', in Narain, A. K. (ed.), Studies in History (B.R. Publishing, Delhi, 1980), pp. 321-38.
- Taylor, J. L. Forest Monks and the Nation-State (Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, Singapore, 1993).
- Taylor, T. 'The Interaction of the Settled and Wild Lands According to the Jātakas' (unpublished thesis, Monash University, 1983).
- Tenbruch, F. H. 'The problem of thematic unity in the works of Max Weber', British Journal of Sociology, 31/3 (1980), pp. 315-51.
- Thapar, R. Aśoka and the Decline of the Mauryas (Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1961).
- Ancient Indian Social History: Some Interpretations* (Orient Longman, New Delhi, 1978).
- 'The Rāmāyaṇa: theme and variation', in Mukherjee, S. (ed.), India: History and Thought (Subarnarakha, Calcutta, 1982), pp. 221-53.
- From Lineage to State* (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1984).
- 'Patronage and community', in Stoler Miller, B. (ed.), The Powers of Art. Patronage in Indian Culture (Oxford University Press, Delhi, 1992), pp. 19-34.
- 'The first millennium B.C. in northern India', in R. Thapar (ed.), Recent Perspectives of Early Indian History (Popular Prakashan, Bombay, 1995), pp. 80-141.
- Thomas, E. J. The History of Buddhist Thought (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1933).
- Tin, D. M. The Dhammapada (Department for the Promotion and Propagation of the Sāsana, Rangoon, 1993).
- Tsuchida, R. 'Two categories of brahmins in the early Buddhist period', The Memoirs of the Toyo Bunko, 49 (1991), pp. 51-95.
- Vetter, T. The Ideas and Meditative Practices of Early Buddhism (E.J. Brill, Leiden, 1988).

- 'Some remarks on older parts of the Suttanipāta', in Seyfort-Ruegg, D. and Schmithausen, L. (eds), Earliest Buddhism and Madhyamaka (E.J. Brill, Leiden and New York, 1990), pp. 36–56.
- von Hinüber, O. A Handbook of Pāli Literature (Walter de Gruyter, Berlin and New York, 1996).
- von Simson, G. 'Die zeitgeschichtliche Hintergrund der Entstehung des Buddhismus und seine Bedeutung für die Datierungsfrage', in Bechert, H. (ed.), The Dating of the Historical Buddha (4 parts, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, Göttingen, 1991).
- Wagle, N. K. Society at the Time of the Buddha (Popular Prakashan, Bombay, 1966).
- Waley, A. (ed. and trans.). The Way and Its Power: A Study of the Tao Te Ching and Its Place in Chinese Thought (Grove Press, New York, 1958).
- Walters, J. 'A voice from the silence. The Buddha's Mother's Story', HR, 33/34 (1994), pp. 358–79.
- Warder, A. K. 'On the relationships between Buddhism and other contemporary systems', Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, 18 (1956), pp. 43–63.
- Watters, T. (trans. and ed.) Yuan Chwang's Travels in India (Munshiram Manoharlal, Delhi, 1961 (Oxford, 1896)).
- Weber, M. Die Wirtschaftsethik der Weltreligionen. Hinduismus und Buddhismus, ed. Schmidt-Glintzer, H. (J.C.B. Mohr, Tübingen, 1998 (Tübingen, 1921)).
The Religion of India: the sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism, trans. and ed. Hans H. Gerth and Don Martindale (Free Press, Glencoe, Ill., 1958/1962).
 Translation of Die Wirtschaftsethik der Weltreligionen.
- Wheatley, P. 'Presidential address: India beyond the Ganges – desultory reflections on the origins of civilization in Southeast Asia', Journal of Asian Studies, 42/1 (1982), pp. 13–28.
- Wijayaratna, M. Le moine bouddhiste: selon les textes du Theravada (Cerf, Paris, 1983).
- Wilhelm, F. 'Hospitality and the caste system', Studien zur Indologie und Iranistik, 20 (1996), pp. 523–9.
- Wilson, P. J. The Domestication of the Human Species (Yale University Press, New Haven and London, 1989).
- Witzel, M. 'Tracing the Vedic dialects', in Caillat, C. (ed.), Dialectes dans les littératures indo-aryennes (Institut de Civilisation Indienne, Collège de France, Paris, 1991), pp. 97–264.
- 'The development of the Vedic Canon and its schools: the social and political milieu', in Witzel, M. (ed.), Inside the Texts. Beyond the Texts (Harvard Oriental Series, Opera Minora 2, Cambridge, Mass., 1997), pp. 257–345.

Index

- Abhaya 239–240, 241, 253
Abhayarājakumārasutta 239
 Acharn Man 177–178
 Acharn Tate 178
Aggañña Suttanta 23, 31 agriculture 50, 63, 85, 91 (see also community, agricultural; farmers) ahimsā 21, 22–23, 146
 Ajātaśatru 100
 Ājivikas 22, 138, 154, 162–163, 221, 222
 Ajjuka 71, 226
Alagaddupamā Sutta 122 alienation 6, 16, 20, 27, 30, 32, 135
 Amarāvati 68, 116
 Ambapālī 66, 243, 248–249
 Ānanda 28, 47, 76, 107, 216, 226
 Anāthapiṇḍika 76, 83, 249, 251 anattā 108–109, 146, 154–155
 Andhakavindhā 62, 73, 242
 Aṅgulimāla 149, 153
Aṅguttara Nikāya 54 animate 155
Āpaṇṇakasutta 124
Āpastambadharmasūtra 17, 19
Āpastambaśrautasūtra 146 appamāda 107, 207, 209
arahant 206–207, 211
aranya 146, 185–186
 archaeological evidence 2, 3–4, 39, 60, 79, 89, 182, 260
Arthaśāstra 29, 44, 91, 104, 148
ārya 99, 106, 119, 211, 230 ascetic 7, 9, 161, 193, 198, 258
 of brahmins 115, 117, 123
 culture (see culture, ascetic) diets of 67 forest dwelling 15, 89
 as mediator 176 movement 33, 40
 tradition 3, 157, 177, 213
 (see also Buddhism, ascetic)
- values (see values, of ascetics) as wanderer 93, 117, 172, 174, 225, 231 asceticism of holy man (see holy man, asceticism of) severe 162, 164, 216 solitary 169
 Āsita 187
 Āsoka 4, 6, 44, 68, 70, 71, 103, 112, 175, 180, 182, 202, 204, 210, 259, 261
 Assaji 74, 224
āṭavika 44, 148
Ātharva Veda 146, 156–157, 192 attā 201, 202
 attachment 192, 200
 Ātumā 72
- Baen 178
 Bureau, A. 165, 171
Baudhāyanadharmasūtra 17, 19, 114 begging 67, 72, 238
 Belaṭṭha Kaccāna 62, 243 belief 139 affective 141–142 cognitive 141–142
 Benares (see Kāśī)
Bhagavatī Sūtra 157
bhikkhu 50, 186, 190–191, 192, 193
 Bhummajaka 74
bhūtas 138
 Bimbisāra 81, 88, 90, 125, 133, 216, 225, 249, 255
 Bon religion 121
 Brahma 100
brahmadeyya 116
Brahmajālasutta 115, 192
Brāhmaṇas 24, 26, 58, 77, 93, 100, 151, 174, 236 brāhmaṇavagga 197
 brāhmanical orthodoxy 121 prescriptions 21
 religion 106

- brahmanism 23, 26, 34, 108, 152, 176
 Brahmayü 127–128
Brahmayusutta 127
 brahmins 21, 25–27, 44–49, 88, 101–102, 108–137, 186, 192, 193
 as arabants 197, 199–200, 214, 260 ascetic of (see ascetic, of brahmins) as astrologers 115
 as casters of spells 115
 communities of 92, 258
 conversion of (see conversion, of brahmins) as cultural vanguard 111, 175, 252
 as donors 66 elite status 113–116
 as gahapati 50, 124, 133–134 ideology of (see ideology, of brahmins) image of 117–119, 123, 130, 133, 196
 learned 100, 114, 115, 171 as mediators (see go-between, brahmin as; mediator, brahmin as) occupations of 60, 106, 113, 115 as royal functionaries 114 settlements 114 social pretensions of 109, 193, 214 as socially divisive 90 wealth of 133, 252 (see also Buddha, opposition towards brahmins)
Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad 100, 122
 Bronkhorst, J. 162
 Brown, P. 173, 228
 Buddha
 charisma of (see charisma, of the Buddha)
 image of 185
 opposition towards brahmins 109, 110, 129 as rational being 130–131 renunciation (see renunciation, by the Buddha)
 reverence towards 10 thirty-two marks of 125–127, 131, 133 uniqueness of 129 wandering (see wandering, Buddha)
Buddhacarita 185
 Buddhism
 ascetic 11, 15, 171
 definition of 9–10, 108, 138, 239, 257, 261
 domestication of 153, 201
 early 61 growth of 6, 171, 239, 257 as ideology (see ideology, Buddhism as) as movement of elites 112, 136 original 8, 10, 15, 18, 34, 198, 200, 205 plurality of 261
 as protest (see protest, Buddhism as) cakkavattin 125
 Campā 61, 71, 80, 81
 Caṇḍāla 42, 43, 44, 63
 Caṅki 132–133
 Caṅkīsutta 132
 caravans 61–62, 66
 Carrithers, M. 17, 177
 caste 7, 21, 40, 41, 42, 44–45 celibacy 1
 Chakravarti, U. 33, 45
 change 2–3, 4, 24, 27, 94, 98, 135, 260
 political 84–85, 174
 religious 91
 charisma 15 of the Buddha 124–126, 129–134, 238
 of monks 178
 Chattopadhyaya, B. 79
 Chattopadhyaya, D. P. 23
 Chutintaranond, S. 177 cities 58–59, 60, 77
 Citta 220 classes 40–41, 116–117, 120 horizontal 170 vertical 170 cohesion
 political 175
 social 42, 51–55, 78
 Collins, S. 17
 communalistic 55 community agricultural 91 autonomy of 41, 44
 bridgehead 94–95
 Buddhist 18 cohesive 92 collapse of 30–31 controlling 175–176 diverse 175, 199, 258 local 10, 42, 106, 168, 212, 213 outlying 7, 93, 98, 99 sense of 171, 175 small 95, 106, 213, 230
 tribal 42–44, 148
 competition 112, 176, 193, 238
 between the Buddha and brahmins 120, 132, 134, 229, 258
 between devotees 242, 249, 251 conflict 91, 94 consciousness of the new 26 nostalgic 28 repressed 3, 77 conversion 131–132, 134
 of brahmins 121, 128, 135
 frame 110, 126, 184, 187, 238, 240–241, 252

- cosmology 93, 101, 106, 129, 138–142, 143, 155, 156, 207–208, 209
and absence of order 143, 155 and impersonal forces 149, 209 meaning and 142, 202 order and 142, 143, 150, 152, 155–156 and personal forces 149
- courtesans 66, 221–222, 224
- cultural groups 21
- culture 7
agrarian 16
ascetic 36
brāhmaṇical 19
mercantile 17 neutral 213
political 20–23 popular 205 shared 171, 175 unity of 100, 170
- cultures alien 98 pluralistic 258, 259 traditional 140
- Dabba 74
- Dakṣhiṇagiri 87
- Dalai Lama 72
- dassana* 126, 128, 130, 242, 244–245, 247, 254, 255
- dāyaka 233–234
- Dehejia, V.
- Deloche, J. 145
- denial of world 35
- detachment 1, 9, 182, 189, 205–206, 217 of monks 8, 168, 184, 206, 209, 211, 213–214, 228
from society 28, 186–195, 200, 219
- Devadatta 28
- devotees 152, 239
- devotion 10 practices of 106, 247, 251 qualities 254–255 stream of 130
- dhamma* 11
- Dhammapada* 8, 196 levels of 213
- Dharaṇikoṭa 68
cultural codification in 78–100
- Dharmasūtras* 113, 192, 236
- dhutāṅga* 163
- dichotomy
of monks 1
- Dīgha Nikāya* 40–41
- dislocation 30
social 6
- display, sumptuary (see sumptuary display)
- domestication 8, 172, 179–181, 201, 215, 230, 233
- donors 71
brahmins as (see brahmins, as donors) institutional 75, 76
- Douglas, M. 144, 212
- dukkha* 3, 20–22, 27–28, 31–32, 142, 223, 260
- Durkheim, E. 149
- Dutt, S. 167, 177
- economic conditions 57 development 2–3, 20, 25 expansion 6, 51, 57, 170
- economy 21
definition of 56
diversified 6, 30–31, 66, 88
expanding 14, 25, 28–29, 63, 75, 173, 260 (see also prosperity, economic)
- macro 61 micro 58, 61 money 17
tribal 58
urban based 63
weakness of 64
- elites 27, 39–55, 71, 105, 194, 226, 233, 251–252, 258–260
agrarian 43
cultural 133, 134–135
definition of 47, 170, 242–244
domination of 33, 105 ethics of (see ethics, for the elites) hierarchical 76 and ideology 6, 52
political 78
urban 14, 51, 168
- Erdosy, G. 5–6, 60, 78, 83
- Ernfors, E. B. and R. F. 234
- esoteric tradition 12
- ethics 40, 184, 186, 190, 194, 195, 202, 222, 261 for the elites 52 of government 204
universalistic 25, 90
- ethnicity 93, 135, 175, 220
- exchange of alms 74 of gifts 236–237 and obligation 236–237
- exploitation 94, 97 and culture 97–98, 101
economic 101

- factions 187
 Falk, N. 147
 famine 63–64, 73 farmers 56
 as brahmins 60
 (see also agriculture)
 Fick, R. 49 folk culture 8, 138–156, 213
 religion 10–12, 138–156
 forest 61, 77, 144–147 dwellers 43, 146, 193, 235, 261 opposition to village 80, 185–186
 tradition 177
 (see also ascetic, forest dwelling; wilderness)
 Franco-Belgian school 14 freedom 1
 Friedrich-Silber, I. 35
gahapati 43, 46–48, 50–53, 114, 186–187, 208, 228, 238, 251
 criticizing monks 218 gaṇa 23, 42, 62
 Ganges Valley 144
 Gārgya 100
 Gethin, R. 156
 Ghaṭikāra 244–248
 Ghosh, A. 81 gift 237 (see also exchange of gifts; sumptuous gifts)
 go-between (see also mediator; middleman) brahmin as 229
 monk as 168, 206, 217, 222, 224
 Gokhale, B. 19, 47, 80
 Gombrich, R. 20–23, 121–122, 141, 162–163
 Gosāla 157
grāma 146, 185–186
 Great Tradition 108, 139, 199, 229, 231 guilds 45, 46, 61, 71, 94
 Heesterman, J. 145 hegemony
 brāhmaṇical 135, 261
 political 171
 Heitzman, J. 69, 70, 182
 heterodox movements 16 teachings 23
 Hinduization 231
 holy man 7, 12, 14, 89, 97, 147, 161–179, 259 appeal of 14, 134, 154, 155, 172, 185, 189–190, 207
 asceticism of 173
 Christian 172
 as mediator (see mediator, holy man as) supernatural skills of 152 as symbol 171 honesty 217–218, 219, 224, 226
 Hsüan-tsang 145
 identity crisis of 7 cultural 105
 formation 91–92 personal 40
 social 126
 ideological support 56 ideology 6, 14, 16, 29, 34, 90, 98, 109, 123, 199, 201, 259
 of brahmins 115, 130, 174, 200
 Buddhism as 19–22, 99, 121
 of elites (see elites, and ideology) of kingship (see kingship, ideology of) of samaṇa (see samaṇa, ideology of)
 for the state 205, 258 universal 39, 78, 109, 151, 175, 203 impartiality 184, 187, 190, 204, 217, 218, 227, 238 impersonal forces (see cosmology, and impersonal forces) principles of cosmos 155–156, 174, 202 inanimate 155 independence 233
 individualism 29–30, 40, 54–55, 174, 201
 Indra 163, 211 inscriptions 71, 180, 232 instability
 political 103–106
 interaction 184, 257 of Buddha with brahmins 112, 123–128, 261 cultural 175
 of elites 51
 of monks with society 2, 9, 40–41, 70, 169, 172, 176, 180–181, 259 between social groups 47–48 with society 1, 40, 195 between states and communities 106 iron 84, 97
 Jagannātha cult 230
 Jainism 16, 19, 21–22, 23
 Jains 3, 27, 138, 162–164, 243, 253, 255–256, 258
 Jamison, S. 236
 Janaka 101
janapadas 94, 186
 Jānussoṇī 121

- Jātakas* 26, 44, 59–60, 62, 80–81, 89, 103, 111, 113, 115, 120, 147–148
- Jayawickrame, N. 166
- Jivakasutta* 238
- Jotipāla 244–247
- Kanpur 79
- Kapilavatthu 80, 82
- Kāśī 77, 78–100, 102, 103, 242, 245–248
- karma* 28, 43, 122, 135, 162, 191, 202–203, 204, 209–210
- Kassapa 235
a former Buddha 244–247
- Kātyāyanasmṛti* 42
- Kauśambī 63, 78–79, 80, 81, 83, 145
- Keṇiya 125–126, 243
- Khaggavisāṇasutta* 167
- Khānumata 249
- Kikī 245–248
- king 204, 213
image of 49, 107, 147
symbols of 96, 147
- kingdoms 186 emerging 13
- kingship 78, 91
ideology of 91, 143
- Kiṭṭāgiri 74, 224
- Kośāla 7, 90, 92, 97, 102, 103, 107, 111, 116, 132
- Kosambi, D. D. 22, 30, 68, 111, 177
- Koṭṭigāma 248
- ḷṣatriya* 28, 29, 45, 88, 97, 100–101, 102, 103, 104, 110, 114, 120, 145, 194, 196, 230, 261
communities of 92
- Kuiper, F. 143
- Kulke, H. 102, 230
- Kuru 145
- Kusāvati 82
- Kūṭadantasutta* 48, 249
- laity 9–10, 18, 25, 28, 52, 53, 131, 139, 155, 198, 206, 207, 218
image of 181, 247, 254
non-regal 75 normative role of 54, 222 opinion of 224 support of monks 71–74, 165, 172, 180, 217, 218, 238
- Lal, M. 79, 145
- Lamotte, E. 14
- landscape 77–78, 79
- life-denying 14
- Little Tradition 176, 177, 199, 229
- luxury goods 63–66 (see also product diversification; sumptuous gifts)
- McNeill, W. 20, 67
- Magadha 2, 7, 88, 90, 92, 97, 102, 103, 116, 125, 216, 243, 249
- Magha 211
- magic 149–150, 153, 156, 157
- Mahābhārata* 29, 54, 108, 135, 174, 247, 261
cultural codification in 78–101
- Mahāparinibbānasutta* 53
- mahāsālā* 114
- Mahāvagga* 52, 65, 73, 225, 241, 242, 244, 253
- Mahāvijita 250
- Mahāvira 157
- Majjhima Nikāya* 40–41, 50, 112–129, 182
- malaise
social 3 spiritual 20
- Malamoud, C. 146
- Māra 167, 203, 206, 212
- Marasinghe, M. 177
- marketing 52, 109, 129–134, 232, 256
- Masefield, P. 119, 120, 156
- Mathurā 60, 81
- Maurya dynasty 2, 81, 83–84, 103, 104
- meal 125, 128, 132, 134, 180, 232, 237–256 importance of 249 obligation to attend 249, 254 as public spectacle 243 ritual nature of 238
- mediation 5, 95, 162, 169, 171, 215
as communication 190
as matchmaking 220
as reconciliation 225 of social hierarchy 182
- mediator (see also go-between; middleman) ascetic as (see ascetic, as mediator)
brahmin as 7, 105, 176, 229–230, 261
holy man as 201, 209, 214
monk as 5, 173–174, 176, 178, 179, 180–181, 184–195, 213, 261
- meditation 189, 198, 207
- memory 27, 171, 260 (see also consciousness, nostalgic)
- Meṇḍaka 243, 248, 255–256
- mendicants 1
- mercantile activity 24, 25, 134 (see also culture, mercantile)
- merchants 2, 16–18, 24, 42, 51, 56, 66, 76, 148, 173 (see also values, of merchants)
- merit 9, 213, 233–237, 254 monk as field of 70, 162, 210 transfer of 74, 123, 169, 178, 217, 221, 234, 242, 256

- Meru, Mount 155
 Mettiya 74 middleman 7, 8, 171, 172, 179, 215, 229 (see also go-between; mediator)
 Migāra 243
Milindapañho 82, 163
 Milner, M. 47, 113–114
 miracles 126
 Moggallāna 47, 74, 220
 monasteries 7–8, 67–70, 75, 172, 179, 181–182, 232, 235, 261
 as centres of consumption 69
 as environment 215 isolation within 86–87 location of 89
 money 25, 57, 78, 84
 monk 5, 25, 139
 ascetic calling of 8, 67, 179
 charisma of (see charisma, of monks) detachment of (see detachment, of monks) dichotomy of (see dichotomy, of monks) as field of merit (see merit, monk as field of) forest dwelling 185, 214
 image of 180–181, 184–195, 214 independence of 175, 187 institutionalized 179 lifestyle 18, 50, 86, 147, 168, 169 as mediator (see go-between, monk as; mediator, monk as) modesty 66, 215–217
 as outsider 182, 195, 226, 231 scholarly 153 status of 64, 226
 (see also six heretical monks; wandering monk) monuments 96–97
 morality 52–55
 Morrison, K. 70
muni 167, 186

nāgas 138, 153
 Nanda dynasty 2, 104
 Narain, A. 18, 19
 Nātaputta 239 neutrality 187, 189–190, 213, 224, 225
nibbāna 208–210, 233
Niddesa 166
nissayas 162–163
 nun 169

 occupation 39, 41, 43–44, 50, 59–61, 82, 88, 251 of brahmins (see brahmins, occupations of) low 65
 secular 114–115, 118
 Oguibenine, B. 122, 240
 Olivelle, P. 118

paccekabuddha 166
 Pande, G. 20
 Pāli Canon 1, 39
 parish priest 15, 67, 172
 Pasenadi 90, 107, 132, 218
 Pāṭaligāma 52, 81
 Patañjali 56, 113
pātimokkha 70
 patrons 78–101, 116, 119, 201, 238
 Pearson, H. 67
 pessimism 20, 30, 31–32 pilgrimage 164
 Pilinda 225–226
 Piṇḍola 216 plague 20
 political centralized authority 94, 96, 99, 100, 105 change (see change, political) cohesion (see cohesion, political) culture (see culture, political) elites (see elites, political) grouping 41 hegemony (see hegemony political) instability (see instability, political) structures 106 unification 2, 84–85 poverty extremes of 20 relative 59
 prestation 76, 84–85 product diversification 61, 78 (see also luxury goods) profit 62 prosperity 3 economic 28, 57 (see also economy, expanding) relative 59
 unequal 18 protest
 Protestantism 16
 Buddhism as 21, 29
 psychic power 74, 216–217, 225–226, 255
pījā 141
 Punabbasu 74, 224
 purification 208, 209, 213–214

 Rairh 60
 Rājagaha 62, 80–83, 86–87, 99, 216, 217, 225, 239, 249, 255
rājan 47, 54, 101, 230
rājanya 21
 Rājghat 61
 ramparts 81, 84, 98–99
 Rau, W. 58
 Rawlinson, A. 153, 155
 Ray, H. 68

- Ray, N. 83
 Ray, R. 129, 166, 185, 186 reciprocity 236–237 renouncer 18, 25–26, 54
 renunciation 1, 14, 258
 by the Buddha 129
 Reynolds, F. 20
 Rhys Davids, T. 122 ritual 151 exaltation 101
 public 97, 102–104, 143, 144
 Robin Hood 148
 Roja 243 role models 15 rural life 50 villages 46
- Sabhiya 193 sacrifice 22, 29, 49, 122–123, 146, 200, 201, 202, 236, 240, 249
salākavuttā 63
samaṇa 5, 46, 202, 204
 Buddhists as 161, 222, 244 identity of 71, 110, 112, 144, 167, 188, 193, 194, 226, 229, 255
 ideology of 46, 118, 149 influence of 123, 232 origin of 162
samaṇic groups 8, 93, 108, 151, 153, 168, 175–176, 258 saṃcarittam 222, 223
saṃnyāsa 117
samsāra 28, 186, 188–189, 192, 206, 212
 Sangāmaji 164
saṃgha 4, 9, 13, 68 elite nature of 236
 of the Four Quarters 167 support for 70
Śāṅkhalikhitadharmasūtra 44
 Sarao, K. T. 87
 Sāriputta 47, 74, 219, 220
Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa 145
 Sāvatti 62, 63, 64, 73, 74, 80–83, 86–87, 219, 220, 234 seat, appointed 238, 240, 245 sects 187
 Sela 125–126
 Selasutta 125
 Serī 65
seṭṭhi 51, 53
 sex 188, 192, 227
 Seyyasaka 181
 Sharma, R. S. 17, 22, 83
Sigālovādasutta 25, 40, 194
- Siha 243, 248, 253
 Sinha, A. K. 83 six heretical monks 71–72, 216, 218, 258
 social change 78, 170
 dislocation 3 distress 173, 174 networks 182, 194 society 1–8, 26, 39, 173
 agrarian 14, 49, 106, 168
 Buddhist 40
 diversity of 39–41, 46 large-scale 39, 42–45, 49–51 not monolithic 39–40, 64 pluralist 39, 46
 small-scale 39, 42 solitude 165–166, 168, 187, 193, 200
Somadatta Jātaka 115
 Southwold, M. 108 spiritual powers 10, 192, 216–217
 Spiro, M. 109
śrauta sacrifice 26, 48, 76, 92, 95, 99–100, 111, 234, 249–251
 stability 3 standards, uniform (see uniform standards) state 10, 16, 20, 77, 213
 expanding 6, 77–89, 98, 170, 199, 201, 205, 258 formation of 27–28, 89 ideology for (see ideology, for the state) orthodoxy for 205 status achieved 29, 112–129, 256 ascribed 17, 29, 52
 disjunction 133, 248
 economic 115
 as goal 110, 128, 194 high 50, 60, 129, 238, 247 monkish 64
 relative 55
 of sumptuary display 71, 252 unifying tendency of 78
 Strenski, I. 233, 236
stūpa 10, 75, 97, 116, 151
 Sudhamma 220
śūdra 45, 104
 sumptuary display 25, 71, 75, 99, 238, 239, 248, 252
 sumptuous gifts 66, 233
 Śunga dynasty 104
 Sunidha 243
 supernatural powers 130, 152, 206, 228, 254 domestication of 154
 (see also magic; miracles)

- Suppiya 243, 251, 253–254
 Suppiyā 243, 251, 253–255 surplus 62, 66–67, 75, 78, 96–97, 101, 232, 234
Sutta Nipāta 8, 9, 26, 60, 111, 114, 118, 164, 166, 184–195
Sutta Piṭaka 8 symbols 170–171, 208 of king (see king, symbols of) religious 142
 (see also holy man, as symbol)
 Syria 173
 Tambiah, S. 122
 Taylor, J. 178
 textual evidence 3–4, 39, 89, 219, 257, 260 secular character of 212
 Thapar, R. 21, 46, 49, 50, 116, 177
Theragāthā 164
 Thui 178
 Thullananda 71, 73–74, 218 tour 86 preaching 73, 242 towns 79, 144–147
 trade 259
 inter-regional 58, 61, 63, 91 intra-regional 61, 78, 91 between micro-economies 61–63 routes 58, 102 traders 14 transcendent teaching 90, 258 transformation 5–6, 8
 tribal community (see community, tribal) economy (see economy, tribal) groups 41, 46
 society tribe nomadic 22
 outlying 78
 unassimilated 42, 213, 230
trivarga 26
 Tsuchida, R. 111, 113, 117, 121, 122
Udāna 164, 166
 Udāyin 215, 220–224
 Ujjain 60, 61, 63, 81, 83, 98 unhappiness 18 (see also malaise) uniform standards 20
 Upāli 226
 Upaniṣadic sages 3, 27
Upaniṣads 100–101, 122, 135, 146
 urban areas 46, 51, 147, 185–186
 culture 170, 203
 economy (see economy, urban based) elites (see elites, urban) perspective in Pāli literature 55, 77 urbanism process of 78 values of 78
 urbanization 2–4, 13–32, 60, 77–89, 168, 171, 174
 vaiśya 45, 88
 Vajjians 166 values 22, 26, 119 of ascetics 172, 201, 205 devotional 26 of merchants 24
 Sanskritic 108 systems of 8, 128, 170, 199
 transcendent 227
 universalistic values 17, 26, 78, 107, 174, 199–200, 203, 211, 218, 229, 259 urban (see urbanism, values of) of wandering monks 198 varga 42, 105
varna 39, 43, 45–50, 82, 87, 92, 101, 104, 119, 122, 126, 136, 170, 174, 240 varṇāśrama 26
 Vassakāra 243
 Vebhaliṅga 244
 Vedas 23
 Vedic
 culture 22, 25, 109
 knowledge as status 49, 114, 200, 207 literature 5, 39, 175, 211 period 20 texts 57, 97, 102, 109
 Vesālī 71, 80, 81, 83, 226, 248
 Videha 111
vihāra 145, 208
 village 77, 79–81, 148, 151, 189–190, 191, 193 (see also rural villages)
 villagers 108–109
Vinaya 8, 40 violence 21
 Vipassin 165
viś 102
 Visākhā 215, 243
 von Simson, G. 23
 Wagle, N. 59, 125
 wandering 13, 16, 30–31, 40, 86–87, 117, 144, 165, 168
 Buddha 88–89, 161
 monk 179, 181, 186, 197–200, 206, 213, 217

- wandering (cont.)
 virtuosi 8, 152, 169, 181
 (see also ascetic, as wanderer; values, of wandering monks)
- Wan Uttamo 178
- warfare 99, 102–104
- wealth 43, 54
 of brahmins (see brahmins, wealth of) as mode of classification 45, 48–54, 248, 251–252, 259 concentration of 66, 194
- detachment from 227
 extremes of 20
- Weber, M. 16, 19, 33, 35–36, 56, 202, 233
- wilderness 144–149, 150, 151–154, 165–168, 173, 174 (see also forest)
- Wilson, P. 95
- Witzel, M. 111
- writing 84
- yakkhas* 131, 138, 147–148, 153